Various flyers circulated by the group says Canadian consumers pay higher prices for foods labeled as kosher. One alleges that a growing number of food processing and manufacturing plants use a hidden kosher food tax to raise food prices.

The flyers suggest taxpayers should claim a deduction ranging from $200 to $500 because they supposedly contributed to a Jewish religious organization when they purchased these goods.

"The intent and message of this literature is deeply offensive to the Jewish community and indeed to all Canadians," Stewart said in a statement. "The so-called 'deduction' described in these flyers does not exist and I urge all taxpayers to ignore this misleading advice."

Shabbat program launched

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Friday night is not just another night of the week. On April 4, 450 shuls in Canada and the United States will prove it.

The National Jewish Outreach Program (NJOP), based in New York, is sponsoring Shabbat Across America, "to celebrate what unites all Jews — Shabbat," a press release explained.

Patterned on the NJOP's Turn Friday Night Into Shabbat program, participants will learn about Jewish traditions, and meet other members of their community in a comfortable and relaxed setting, the release goes on. The evening will include a short prayer service and a traditional Shabbat meal, complete with singing and dancing. Questions and answers are encouraged.

Rabbi Reuven Tradburks, spiritual leader of Kehillat Shaarei Torah synagogue in North York, said that "we desperately need to show American and Canadian Jews that Shabbat — and Judaism — is more than chicken soup and gefilte fish. It's an enriching spiritual event that happens every week.

"You will enjoy singing, dancing, good food and wine and a chance to leave the outside world behind, while spending quality time with family and friends. Let's face it. You can't have quality time without quantity time."

One of the noteworthy aspects of Shabbat Across America is that it crosses denominational lines. Orthodox, Conservative, Reform and Reconstructionist synagogues are taking part. In Toronto, Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda, Temple Har Zion, Kehilat Shaarei Torah, Beth Jacob, and Beth Tzedec are offering the program. Shuls in Edmonton, Vancouver, Halifax, Chomedey, Ottawa, Winnipeg, Kitchener, London, Ont., and Montreal are also participating.

For more information, or to find out where to take part, call the toll-free number, 1-888-742-2228.

Exhibit explores survivor's experiences

By DAVID J. LITVAK
Special to The CJN

VANCOUVER — On The Edge of The Abyss, an exhibit at the Holocaust Education Centre at the JCC here, chronicles the experiences of Holocaust survivor and artist Ella Liebermann-Shiber.

The exhibit, which was produced by the Tampa Bay Holocaust Memorial Museum and Educational Centre in cooperation with Beit Lohamei Haghetaot (The Ghetto Fighters' House in Israel), is sponsored by the Vancouver Holocaust Centre Society for Education and features 93 sketches made by Liebermann-Shiber. In 1945, at age 17, she was released from a Nazi concentration camp.

In the exhibit, Liebermann-Shiber claims that her mother was instrumental in helping her survive the horrors that were surrounding her. She adds that "one other factor was instrumental in saving her life." She wanted to survive so that she could document the atrocities she had seen, and she did that by drawing.

"I drew their faces, cold murderous eyes, I drew their families, their wives and their children, in spite of whom they murdered, the wives and children of others in a strange land."

And her chilling sketches manage to convey both personal suffering and the suffering of those around her. One sketch, The Gestapo Cellar, depicts a Nazi officer looking on while three of his comrades are beating a Jew to death. The Jew being beaten was the artist's uncle.

Liebermann-Shiber says two other uncles "received terrible blows and were mutilated beyond recognition," but survived the beating.

Another sketch entitled German Thoroughness depicts a Nazi standing on top of a pile of dead and nearly dead bodies. Underneath the pile was Liebermann-Shiber's sister.

"To make sure that they were all dead, he stabbed the still-warm bodies," she said. "My sister was underneath a pile of bodies. The bullet had missed her. Miraculously, she survived."

Many of Liebermann-Shiber's other sketches depict the destruction of synagogues. After portraying the discrimination and degradation of the Jews, the sketches depict the deportation of Jews to the concentration camps in packed cattle cars.

The most prominent section of the exhibit, which is called To Auschwitz and Beyond, chronicles the horrors of the concentration camps, mass killings, the murder of children and the torture, beatings and forced labor to which the Nazis subjected the Jews of Eastern Europe.

One particularly chilling sketch portrays the bones of Jews being crushed and ground to serve the Nazi war effort. Another depicts the murderous Dr. Josef Mengele deciding who shall live and who shall die.

Other grisly sketches depict the death marches that Jews were forced to take. Liebermann-Shiber's exhibit ends on a hopeful note — a sketch of her liberation.

But this one optimistic note is tempered by the very last sketch in the exhibit, which depicts a tombstone with the following Hebrew inscription: "Remember the six million holy ones slaughtered by crazy beasts from Nazi Germany in a cruel and horrible manner on the soil of Europe during the time of the Holocaust 1933-1945."

On the Edge of the Abyss will be shown at the Holocaust Education Centre at the Jewish Community Centre of Greater Vancouver until May 1.

Israeli Counsellor meets with students

By VIVA PRESS
Special to The CJN

HALIFAX — Chen Ivri, the newly arrived counsellor from the Israeli Embassy in Ottawa, recently spoke about Israel and the peace process to students at Dalhousie University here.

Ivri came to the Maritimes to meet with the small Jewish communities and spoke to students at both the University of New Brunswick and Dalhousie during his visit.

"It's important to talk to the students because they're the leaders of tomorrow," he said.

Irvi spoke about the peace process in the Middle East as seen through Israeli eyes.

"The peace process started with the Egyptians," he said. Since the peace agreement with Egypt in the late 1970s, Israel has made peace with Jordan, and they're now in peace agreement talks with the Palestinians.

"So far we have the interim agreement," Ivri said. "Both Israel and the PLO have to have a lot of creativity to find a solution. We have to be optimistic because there is no option to the peace process."

Ivri explained why he believes Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu was right when he ordered the Palestinian offices to close in Jerusalem.

"Jerusalem is excluded from the interim agreement, which means that the Palestinian side has to shut down those offices if they are related to the Palestinian Authority," Irvi said. "They can have offices in Gaza and Jericho, but not in Jerusalem.

"When talking about reciprocity in the peace process, Israel has to implement a few things, and the Palestinians do too," he said. "One of the things is to shut down the Palestinian offices."

As for the Palestinians' outcry over Israel's nine percent withdrawal, Ivri said "it's bizarre to say it's too low."

"According to the peace process, it was agreed that in the three stages of redevelopment, the amount of territory will be decided unilaterally by the Israelis according to the security measures," Ivri said. "You can find experts that say a 10 percent withdrawal is dangerous and will endanger the Jewish settlements."

Ivri also spoke about the many international expectations placed on Israel in the peace process. He said Canada as well as other countries can help alleviate some of these pressures.

"International countries can contribute a lot to the atmosphere of a real peace process and reconciliation between the two people," Ivri said. "There are many ways to do this. These countries can help bring people to people, help the Palestinians economically, and do a lot in the multilateral channel."

Ivri seemed optimistic that the peace process will work, but he admitted that Jerusalem may cause a problem.

"Our position is that Jerusalem has never been a capital of other people for 3,000 years," he said. "We cannot let Jerusalem become a new Berlin with a new wall, separating people. It's one city and it's a city in which Israelis are tying to do their best to let other people from other religions have equality."

Ivri said he does not think the issue of Jerusalem as the capital for the Jews has to hurt the peace process.

"We think the Palestinians have to admit and accept this position," he said.

Hussein's visit shows strength of peace with Jordan

Makes unprecedented visit to bereaved

By HERB KEINON
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Jordan's King Hussein came to us last week like a distant relative who manages to visit every once in a while for a funeral. The gesture of the visit is greatly appreciated, but something is missing.

The relatives burying their dead can be heard whispering, "Why doesn't he ever come on a happy occasion or even just to visit? Why does he wait so long?"

Since the peace accord was signed with Jordan in 1994, King Hussein has publicly visited four times. Once for Yitzhak Rabin's funeral, once to dedicate a trauma centre named after Rabin at Tel Aviv's Ichilov Hospital and now for the shivah call. One time, soon after the signing, he did come just to say hello.

"I appreciate his visit," said Beit Shemesh shopkeeper Gregory Ya'acovov, whose store was on one of the streets closed down because it was on the king's route. "I just wish he could come once for a celebration."

A handful of Beit Shemesh residents stood outside the house of Adi Malka, the king's first stop in the town, to catch a glimpse of the king, even to pay him homage. Had King Hussein come under better circumstances, it is likely that the empty streets — despite the rain — would have been full of people standing under Jordanian and Israeli flags, throwing rice and flowers.

Israel likes the king, despite all the ups and downs.

King Hussein, with gestures such as those he made last week, has charmed the country. It is to King Hussein's infinite credit that he used the horror at Naharayim as a way to try and patch up relations that were severely soured last week.

His visit to the bereaved, his shivah call, was both unprecedented and poignant. Watching him kneel in the homes and — in his resonant, empathetic, royal voice — offer his condolences did have a balm-like effect, if not on the families suffering beyond comfort, then at least on much of the nation.

"Words cannot express how I personally feel, how my family feels, how my people feel. We consider this a loss that all of us suffered," King Hussein said in the Malka home, his words, delivered slowly, swiftly translated into sign language for the grieving parents, who are both deaf.

"I feel that I have lost a child, and I feel that if there is anything in life, it is to ensure that all the children enjoy peace and security. I hope you consider me a brother and a member of the family."

When was the last time an Arab leader so mourned the victims of terror? Who would have dreamed a few years ago that such words would be uttered by the head of an Arab state?

It is, likewise, to Israel's credit that the king was welcomed so openly, so warmly. It is difficult to imagine such a greeting had the shoe been on the other foot, had Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu needed to pay a condolence call on the families of Jordanian youths killed by an Israeli soldier.

Beit Shemesh, hot-blooded Beit Shemesh, known to many only as the place where Labor leader Shimon Peres was pelted with tomatoes during a campaign stop in the 1980s, greeted King Hussein with restraint, with respect. This, even though the town of 25,000, many of whom are linked by family ties, was still in shock, still licking its wounds after the killing of the young girls.

That the king made the visit, and that the Israelis accepted him so readily, shows that the peace between Israelis and the Jordanian leadership has sunk deep roots.

"Sad, so sad," murmured Esther Afriati, watching in the rain as King Hussein was hustled from his limousine into the Malka home. Her daughter is in the eighth-grade class at the AMIT Fuerst school that went to Naharayim, but because of financial constraints, didn't join the group. "It is nice that he came; it does an aching heart good," she said. "Next time he should come for a happy event."

Hussein pays hospital visit to Ezer Weizman

By BATSHEVA TSUR
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — "Our legacy for all our children must be peace, security, and friendship — all the things that we, in our generation, have missed," King Hussein declared after embracing and kissing President Ezer Weizman in his hospital bed at Hadassah-University Hospital in Jerusalem's Ein Kerem.

Weizman was recuperating in hospital after he suffered a broken wrist and hip in a fall last week while alighting from a helicopter. He was returning from a visit with the grieving families of the girls who had been killed in Naharayim.

"We have had a few days of real sorrow and national shame over this terrible crime," King Hussein said. "I tried to express [to the bereaved families] that we shared that loss. Don't be surprised to see me here, that loss is very personal."

Weizman described the king's visit as "a brave and courageous act in these terrible circumstances."

He said that "we have to look for the positive side even in disaster.... The king knelt before the people whose daughters were killed by his soldier. It is an important visit both from the humanitarian and the political points of view. I too will do everything possible to bring everyone closer."

Weizman then invited Hussein to pay another visit, under happier circumstances. "You see our country in sadness," he said. "I invite you to come and see us also when it is blooming and industrious."

Weizman, who was clearly in pain, nevertheless kept up his good spirits as his hospital bed was wheeled into a large room in the orthopedic ward, where carpets had been laid down to receive King Hussein. It was soon far too small to contain all those who crowded in, including Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and other cabinet members.

Reuma Weizman, who accompanied Hussein all day, returned to join her husband at his bedside, where he had been tended by his daughter, Michal.

"What are you doing in bed?" King Hussein said jovially as he came towards Weizman.

"We are both pilots, but you flew here today and I am grounded," Weizman replied.

Turning to King Hussein's daughter, Princess Aisha, who was dressed in her Jordanian army uniform, Weizman said: "I watched you admiringly on my TV screen."

Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai took the opportunity to invite Aisha and her brother, Prince Faisal, to visit as guests of the IDF.

On the seventh floor, the atmosphere was less jovial. King Hussein visited Yaffa Shmuel, one of the pupils seriously wounded in the Naharayim attack, and presented her with a pendant and gold hamsa. To her teacher, Yaffa Shukrun, lying alongside her, King Hussein extended an invitation to visit Jordan.

Tensions ease but housing on Har Choma to proceed

no-confidence motions against the government's decision to build at Har Choma.

Before holding their talks, Netanyahu and Hussein spent the day paying condolence visits to the families of the seven Israeli schoolgirls killed by a Jordanian soldier last week.

Hussein's trip was widely viewed as an effort to patch up relations between the two countries, days after the king had sent an angry letter to the Israeli leader warning of the dangers of building at Har Choma. The shooting occurred a day after the letter's publication.

Hussein referred to his letter during the news conference, saying that it was "never meant for publication." He added that it was "leaked mysteriously" and that it contained "many distortions."

Both Netanyahu and King Hussein stressed the importance of communication in the peace process.

"It was a personal letter," Hussein added. "No offence was intended."

Netanyahu echoed the king's conciliatory statements, saying, "I believe that our disagreements have to be ironed out in direct conversations and human contacts."

While Netanyahu did not budge on the Har Choma plans, he acknowledged that Israel was willing to be more flexible with the Palestinians in other areas.

Both he and King Hussein confirmed that they had spoken by telephone with Palestinian Authority leader Yasser Arafat.

"We spoke to Chairman Arafat," Netanyahu said, adding, "We cannot let our disagreements, which are yet unresolved, destroy the process."

At the news conference, Hussein and Netanyahu repeatedly emphasized their commitment to peace despite last week's shooting of the schoolgirls at the Naharayim enclave, which is under Jordanian control and leased to Israel under the two countries' 1994 peace treaty. Hussein said the two discussed a special project that would be set up at the enclave in memory of the murdered children.

He also pledged a full investigation of the incident. Countering reports that Israeli-Palestinian contacts had broken down over Har Choma, Netanyahu said that one of the joint committees negotiating unresolved issues from the Hebron agreement, which was signed in January, had recently met.

In a clear gesture to Arafat, he said a joint committee discussing security at a new Palestinian airport in southern Gaza had agreed that Israel would allow Arafat to take off and land from the airport, even before all details of its operations were completed.

Netanyahu also said he expected that other Israeli-Palestinian committees would continue discussions.

Despite his assurances, it remained unclear whether the impasse in the Israeli-Palestinian relations was overcome.

Palestinian officials have claimed that the construction would alter the status quo of Jerusalem, whose future is to be determined in the final-status talks.

Those discussions were scheduled to resume this week, but Palestinian leaders said they might not attend.

Israel maintains that it has the right to build anywhere in Jerusalem and that the construction is not prohibited by the Israeli-Palestinian accords.

Arafat convened foreign diplomats in Gaza to discuss what he described as unilateral steps taken by Israel.

In addition to Har Choma, Palestinians were outraged over Israel's decision to withdraw from a smaller area of the West Bank than they deemed adequate.

For the first of three further redeployments called for in the Hebron accord, Israel had announced that it would pull out of nine percent of rural West Bank areas, two percent of which are now under sole Israeli control. But the Palestinian Authority angrily rejected the plan, prompting a delay in its implementation.

In a four-hour meeting with envoys from the United States, Russia, the European Union, Norway, Japan, Jordan and Egypt, Arafat asked his guests to "save the peace process."

"We no longer have a partner" in Israel because of Netanyahu's recent actions, Arafat said.

The envoys pledged to convey Arafat's protests to their governments and to make them clear to Israel.

Edward Abington, the U.S. consul general to Jerusalem, said the diplomats agreed that "each government would conduct intensive efforts to lower the tension and restore confidence."

Old blood libel levelled at Israel by PA

By URIEL HEILMAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — The centuries-old blood libel levelled at Jews was revived again last week at a human-rights forum in Geneva, when Palestinian representative Nabil Ramlawi accused the "Israeli authorities" of having "infected by injection 300 Palestinian children with the HIV virus during the intifadah."

The same charge was printed in late January by the Egyptian daily Al-Ahram. However, it was retracted several days later; Al-Ahram admitted on its front page that the story was completely false.

Responding to Ramlawi's accusation at the session of the United Nations Commission on Human Rights, Christian Solidarity International representative David Littman called upon the commission to "challenge manifest anti-Semitism...and prepare a declaration from the chair outlawing such racist statements."

Calling the charge "false" and "grotesque," Littman lamented "the foul accusations, [which were] followed so tragically — albeit in a different context — by the cold-blooded shooting of Israeli schoolgirls by a demented Jordanian soldier, who would probably have believed every single word of hatred pronounced three days ago."

The Israeli representative to the commission, Yosef Lamdan, urged the president of the 53rd Session of the Commission on Human Rights to expose the "hideous libel" and cease to take Ramawi seriously.

"He apparently advocates the well-trained technique of the 'big lie,'" Lamdan wrote in a letter to the president.

In his speech, Littman reminded the commission that this was not the first time such libels were produced against Israel. In 1983, then-chairman of the PLO Yasser Arafat accused Israel of "poisoning Palestinian schoolgirls" in a letter addressed to the UN secretary-general, a charge later confirmed as false by a team of independent medical experts.

Urging the creation of a similar medical team to investigate this latest charge, Littman suggested that, if proved to be false, the international community declare the calumny a "racist crime" punishable by an international tribunal.

Reform threatens Israel fund boycott

By HAIM SHAPIRO
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — If IDF soldiers can't visit Reform synagogues on educational field trips, while being allowed to visit yeshivot where they are exhorted to be religiously observant, the Reform Movement will boycott all Israeli speakers and fundraisers abroad, an official of Israel's Reform Movement warned recently.

Anat Galili, spokesperson for the Reform Movement's Israel Religious Action Centre, was responding to an item in Yated Ne'eman, the haredi daily, which said henceforth official IDF field trips would not take soldiers to visit mosques, churches or Reform temples. The paper said soldiers' visits to mosques, churches, and Reform institutions were stopped following a parliamentary question by MK Moshe Gafni (United Torah Judaism) to the defence minister.

Gafni said some soldiers are unwilling to enter such places. The paper said Chief of General Staff Lt.-Gen. Amnon Shahak ordered that visits to these institutions be stopped, after Gafni's question.

Galili said the Reform Movement could live with a decision that would exclude visits to Reform institutions, if the order also applied to yeshivot that try to convince people to become observant. If some soldiers object to visiting Reform institutions, others object to visiting yeshivot, she said.

If the ban is not a general one, she said, official Israeli representatives and fundraisers would be banned from all Reform congregations abroad. The ban, she added, could well extend to the activities of Jewish federations, since in many of these organizations Reform Jews play a leading role.

On April 4

a half million people across America and Canada will come together to eat, drink, relax, dance, enjoy, debate and celebrate.

On Friday night, April 4, 1997, the North American Jewish community will gather in hundreds of synagogues across the continent to celebrate what unifies all Jews -- SHABBAT! And everyone is invited... singles, couples, families -- all ages. So bring your neighbors, your friends, your co-workers -- and let's celebrate, together! Canadian MDs help heal Middle East wounds

By JUDY SIEGEL-ITZKOVICH
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — The Isabel Silverman Canada International Scientific Exchange Program (CISEPO) hopes to be a catalyst for bringing Israelis, Jordanians, Palestinians and others together by encouraging joint medical research and collaboration.

Feature

CISEPO was founded in 1984 by Prof. Arnold Noyek, chief of otolaryngology at Mount Sinai Hospital in Toronto.

It began as a bilateral program between Israel and Canada to promote cooperation in the ear-nose-and-throat (ENT) specialty, especially in dealing with cancer.

Within two years, however, Noyek and his colleagues decided to expand CISEPO's agenda. "We decided to bring others into it so that everyone benefits," said Noyek in a recent interview during one of his frequent visits to Israel.

CISEPO, which has an annual budget of $300,000 (mostly from the Saul Silverman Family Foundation in Toronto), forged formal links with Hadassah University Hospitals in Jerusalem, the Rabin Medical Center in Petah Tikvah, Wolfson Hospital in Holon, the Weizmann Institute in Rehovot and Soroka Hospital in Beersheba, as well as the King Hussein Medical Center in Amman, Green Lane Hospital in Auckland, New Zealand, and University Hospital in Utrecht, the Netherlands. It also has ties with the Arab community in Canada, which numbers in the tens of thousands. "We have excellent relations with Palestine House-Canada in Toronto, which is headed by Rashad Saleh and Shawki Fahel. At the same time, we have close ties with B'nai B'rith and the Canadian Jewish Congress, and representatives of both have met with heads of Palestine House."

Using its connections with Canadian medical institutions, CISEPO aims to enrich academic medicine and health care both locally and internationally and — with respect to Israel and its neighbors — "to contribute to enhancing security and peace and furthering the goal of economic and cultural growth and development," Noyek explained.

The program provides academic, financial and directorial support to several programs here and has initiated collaborative research and medical service programs in this area involving Canadian and Middle Eastern professionals.

"When medical cultures rub up against each other, the result is synergistic. Both of them gain," Noyek said.

He said CISEPO's programs are growing to other disciplines, but because ENT is his specialty — and because otolaryngology was the pioneer in endoscopy and other non-invasive medical procedures — it will continue to be prominent. So far, CISEPO researchers have produced 250 medical articles in textbooks and journals around the world.

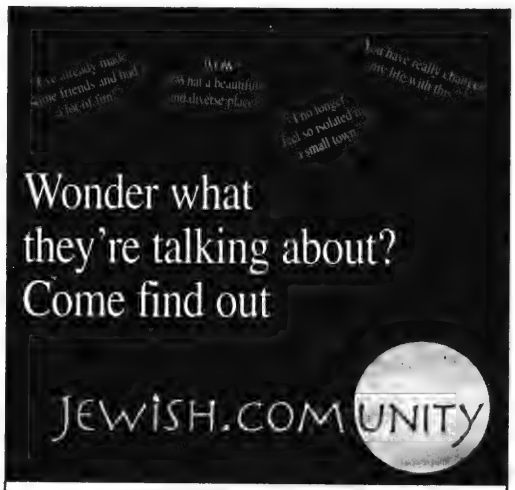
Philip Aber, CISEPO's policy planning adviser, who accompanied Noyek on his latest trip, noted that recent meetings they organized in Gaza involving Israelis, Palestinians and Jordanians were successful. "The Jordanians are very encouraging of scientific cooperation with Canada and want it to expand to other neighbors in the region," he said. "The same is true of the Palestinians, but it has to occur at a pace that satisfies all the partners."

Health Minister Yehoshua Matza met with Noyek and Aber during their visit here and endorsed efforts to serve as a bridge between doctors in the region. "Israel can and should reach out to its neighbors and establish lasting partnerships that address common interests. Our organization can serve as an honest broker," Aber added.

The result is the establishment of a CISEPO Canada-Israel-Palestinian Authority medical and health services program.

It will extend to dentistry, nursing, public health and other medical and paramedical specialties.

Palestinian doctors are "realistic" about the need for cooperation with Israelis, said Aber. "They and the Israelis both know you can't have economic and social development without peace, or peace without economic and social development."



Every day, hundreds of people from all walks of life congregate in the Jewish.Community Online chat rooms to debate, give support, flirt, and say what's on their minds. Come join us!

Temple Mount mosque to stay open

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Israel's High Court of Justice ruled this week that a recently established mosque beneath the Temple Mount can remain open.

However, a dissenting member of the three-justice panel recommended that the Israeli government reconsider allowing the mosque to operate.

The petition to shutdown the mosque was submitted by two Israeli groups, the Temple Mount Faithful and Hai v'Kayam. They argued that the creation of a new Muslim prayer site in the area offended the sensitivities of Haredim.

Chief Justice Aharon Barak and Justice Yitzhak Zamir maintained that the two petitioners had not proved that the presence of Muslims praying under the Temple Mount inflicted harm on the feelings of Jews, who also consider the site holy.

Justice Eliezer Goldberg, who dissented, said Jewish sentiments could be hurt by the continued operation of the mosque.

The mosque, which opened in December, is located beneath the Temple Mount in the site known as Solomon's Stables.

The Week in Israel

Mar. 10

• An IDF soldier and two Lebanese children were wounded when a car bomb exploded in the southern Lebanon security zone. A soldier was also wounded Sunday in an exchange of fire with Hezbollah.

Mar. 11

• An IDF soldier guarding the community of Omarim, south of Hebron, was repeatedly stabbed. He is in stable condition. A number of suspects were arrested.

• Israel and the European Union signed an agreement for Israeli scientists to use satellite photographs to conduct coastal research. The advanced technologies will enable researchers to study and map sea depths, currents, wind patterns and beach erosion.

Mar. 12

• Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu concluded an official visit to Russia, declaring a "new partnership" between the two countries. Russian President Boris Yeltsin expressed concern about Israel's housing plans in Har Choma but also called for an increase in trade with the Jewish state.

Mar. 13

• Seven schoolgirls were killed, five wounded along with a teacher when a Jordanian soldier shot them as they toured Naharayim in the Jordan Valley.

• Opposition leader Shimon Peres declined an invitation to participate in the weekend gathering in Gaza of foreign diplomats organized by Yasser Arafat to muster support for his allegations of Israeli violations of the Oslo accords.

• Israel announced the first phase of construction on Har Choma would begin next week.

Mar. 14

• A joint Jordanian-Israeli inquiry was launched into last Wednesday's nightmare at Naharayim. The investigation will try to ascertain how an unarmed Jordanian soldier, reportedly a driver, managed to take a rifle from one of his colleagues and open fire on the schoolgirls.

Arafat can do more

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mideast Analysis

A year ago last winter, a wave of four Islamic fundamentalist suicide bombings rocked Jerusalem, Ashkelon and Tel Aviv, killing more than 60 civilians, rattling the peace process and contributing to the unseating of the Labor party government.

The crisis prompted the Palestinian Authority (PA), headed by Yasser Arafat, to crack down on Hamas and Islamic Jihad. Due to greater PA vigilance, Israeli sweeps, international pressure and a sense that the prospect of peace should not be held hostage by terrorism, there has not been a single suicide bombing since then, despite occasional calls by Islamic radicals for "armed struggle" against Israel.

Such is the present situation, that Hamas and Islamic Jihad have openly acknowledged that the PA has prevented them from carrying out further suicide attacks, while Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has conceded that the PA is no longer playing a "double game" of condemning terror while cynically exerting "feeble efforts" to stamp it out.

On the theoretical level, too, the PA has come a long way since the autumn of 1994, the year the suicide bombings began.

• In his first face-to-face meeting with Netanyahu last summer, Arafat said, "Security is not just for you but for us. This is a permanent policy."

• As part of its recent Hebron agreement with Israel, the PA reaffirmed its commitment to combat terror, stop violence, apprehend, prosecute and punish terrorists, act systematically against terrorist organizations and confiscate illegal arms.

• In talks with President Bill Clinton at the White House earlier this month, Arafat agreed to strengthen cooperation with Israel and the United States in the war on terrorism.

Be that as it may, the PA is still not in full compliance with its obligation under the Oslo accords to "take all measures necessary" to prevent terrorists operating in its territory from attacking Israel.

Despite the PA's arrest of terrorist leaders, raids against Hamas institutions, replacement of imams preaching support for terrorism and public condemnations of terror, Arafat can do more, as Netanyahu, Clinton and the chief of Israeli military intelligence have noted.

In a report released several months ago, the former Israeli army coordinator in the territories, Gen. Oren Shahor, took the PA to task for ignoring the terrorist infrastructure in Palestinian autonomous areas.

And in a separate report, Peace Watch said the PA had not followed through with a 1996 decree outlawing the military wings of Hamas and Islamic Jihad, had released numerous Islamic activists from prison, and had ignored more than a dozen Israeli extradition requests.

In addition, Peace Watch said that the PA had undermined its denunciations of terrorism by praising leading terrorists as martyrs, calling for holy war and threatening a new intifadah if Palestinian political demands are not met.

The PA's uneven record with respect to confronting terrorism stems from one major factor.

Although the majority of Palestinians support the peace process, there is a strong and vocal segment in their community that rejects Israel's existence, portrays the Oslo agreements as a betrayal of Palestinian rights and considers terrorism as a legitimate weapon.

Arafat, though keenly aware of this disruptive constituency, is reluctant to suppress it completely. He fears that a showdown with the rejectionists would ultimately trigger an Algerian-style civil war, the cost of which would be terrible. It would diminish his stature and power in the eyes of Palestinians and Arabs alike and, catastrophically, could lead to the disintegration of the Palestinian self-rule areas.

Arafat, however, realizes that a renewal of the suicide bombing campaign would be disastrous. It would stymie final status negotiations, delay further Israeli withdrawals from the territories and perhaps, dash hopes for an independent Palestinian state.

Arrow launch a success

By ARIEH O'SULLIVAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Last week's successful test launch of the Arrow anti-ballistic missile marked a significant step toward an initial deployment of the defence system against surface-to-surface missiles by the end of next year.

It was the fourth test launch of the Arrow 2 missile and a Defence Ministry statement said the Arrow succeeded in locking onto and destroying the target missile fired from a navy ship. However, it said a malfunction in the warhead prevented the Arrow from detonating its warhead. The target was destroyed by the direct hit.

Engineers at Israel Aircraft Industries are analyzing the data to evaluate and confirm the results. Interception is supposed to take place between 10 kilometres and 50 kilometres above the ground.

The test launch of the interceptor took place at the Palmahim Air Base north of Ashdod. The test marked the first time that the system's Green Pine control radar and Citron Tree battle management centre participated.

"Both worked according to plan and fulfilled all the test objectives," the statement said.

U.S. and Israeli engineering teams were "very satisfied with the test results and are confident that they constitute significant forward progress toward a total integrated weapon system, the statement added."

The mainly U.S.-financed missile was last tested in August. At that time, it made its first impressive "metal-on-metal" direct hit of a target missile at high altitude. Another test is planned for this summer.

News of the successful test launch came as Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai was meeting with King Hussein at his palace in Amman. The monarch told Mordechai it was a "great achievement."

Mordechai later said he emphasized to King Hussein that the Arrow could be used for regional defence.

Mordechai later praised the test and said that the "significant and positive progress" of the Arrow project is bringing Israel to the forefront of world technology.

The IDF already has ordered two Arrow batteries, which are expected to be ready by the end of next year. Their deployment is expected to greatly enhance the protection from Scud surface-to-surface missiles, but will hardly be enough to completely eliminate the threat.

The United States and Israel are financing the Arrow's development. So far, the project has cost $700 million (US), with Israel's share being $250 million.

The projected cost is about $1.6 billion, but analysts have reportedly said the missile could cost many times that figure. Because of U.S. financing, Israel has agreed to give the United States access to the Arrow's research and development data.

'My distress is genuine'

Excerpts from the letter sent last week by King Hussein of Jordan to Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

Prime Minister,

My distress is genuine and deep over the accumulating tragic actions which you have initiated as the head of the government of Israel. Making peace — the worthiest objective of my life — appears more and more like a distant elusive mirage. I could remain aloof if the very lives of all Arabs and Israelis and their future were not fast sliding towards an abyss of bloodshed and disaster, brought about by fear and despair.

I frankly cannot accept your repeated excuse of having to act the way you do under great duress and pressure. I cannot believe that the people of Israel seek bloodshed and disaster and oppose peace. Nor can I believe that the most constitutionally powerful prime minister in Israeli history would act on other than his total convictions. The saddest reality that has been dawning on me is that I do not find you by my side in working to fulfil God's will for the final reconciliation of all the descendants of the children of Abraham.

Your course of actions seem bent on destroying all I believe in or have striven to achieve with the Hashemite family since Faisal the First and Abdullah to the present times. You cannot send me assurances that you would not sanction any further construction of settlements and [you] tell me of your decision to construct two roads to help all concerned Israelis and Palestinians alike and then [you] renege on your commitment. In pushing matters to the point of securing a U.S. veto at the Security Council, you have ill served the image and interest of your major ally and benefactor and our partner in peace making as the honest balanced peace broker.

Mr. Prime Minister, if it is your intention to maneuver our Palestinian brethren into inevitable violent resistance, then order your bulldozers into the proposed settlement site without doing much which is needed in recognition of Palestinian and Arab sensitivity, anger and despair and ameliorating the situation, then order the young Israeli members of your powerful armed forces surrounding Palestinian towns to commit wanton murder and mayhem, possibly resulting in creating yet a fresh exodus of hapless Palestinians from theirs, and their ancestors, homeland and bury the peace process for all times.

On the question of your withdrawal from territories you have committed Israel, before the United States, Jordan, and the world, to complete the process by mid-1998, what good did it serve to offer such an insignificant first phase withdrawal? Why the apparent continued deliberate humiliation of your so called Palestinian partners? Can any worthwhile relationship thrive in the absence of mutual respect and trust?

Sincerely,
Hussein

Gilda's Club cancer support facility coming to Toronto

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Comedian Gilda Radner was one of the brightest lights of the early Saturday Night Live shows. Her mishkabibbled Roseanne Rosanadanna is the stuff of comedic legend.

Radner lost her battle with ovarian cancer in 1989, but her legacy is a network of free, non-profit, non-residential support communities for men, women and children with cancer, as well as for their families, called Gilda's Club.

The first one was opened in 1995 in New York. Others are being created in Detroit, Fort Lauderdale and Nashville.

Gilda's Club is now coming to Toronto. Volunteers, supporters and members of the cancer support community are working to create a permanent home in Greater Toronto. They hope to raise $3 million over the next three years, through corporate and private donations and from foundations, and to open in fall, 1998.

A benefit fundraiser will be held April 2, at the Paradise Banquet Hall and Convention Centre, 7601 Jane St., in Concord. Tickets are $100.

The event, called Sparkles '97, after Radner's dog, Sparkle, will include comedy, drama, a fashion show with headliners Enza Unitque and Malabar Ltd., and a five-course dinner.

A silent auction will feature such items as a New York trip, with passes to Late Night with David Letterman and the Rosie O'Donnell Show; a vacation for two to Jamaica; spa packages; and horseback riding lessons.

Hosts for the evening are Hair Salon Visible Changes and Sebastian International, together with Metro Beauty Supply and Paradise Convention Centre.

Actor Gene Wilder, who was married to Radner at the time of her illness and death, called the club "an unfulfilled wish she had before she died. It is her and our gift to other Gildas who need a place to go, alone or with their families, to learn to shake off feelings of hopelessness and isolation and reclaim their gift of laughter."

For more information, contact Gilda's Club Greater Toronto, 636-3318, or Hair Salon Visible Changes, 733-1101.

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. We hear a lot about fat grams these days, how much should the average person be consuming per day?

A. The average female can consume approximately 60 grams of fat per day while the average male can consume approximately 90 grams of fat per day (to maintain not lose weight). Remember these numbers when reading packages. If you are about to indulge in an ice cream bar as a snack, containing a whopping 28 grams of fat, realize that that is half your daily intake in one snack.

Q. I always find the mornings to be such a rush that I rarely have time for a proper breakfast, do you have any advice?

A. It is important to remember that breakfast is anything, anywhere, as long as its eaten before lunch. It can be a banana and a piece of cheese on the bus, a granola bar and juice box in the car or leftover pizza on the way to school. Something is better than nothing at all. In this age of busy lifestyles there are a lot of convenience foods that make it easy to eat on the run. Try breakfast cereal bars, individual packs of instant hot cereal at your desk, granola bars, yogurt, a bagel, low-fat muffins, fruit, dried fruit or a milkshake.

Special to The CJN

It's a total look this spring — eyes lips and cheeks are painted with soft pastel colors and shimmered with gold and pearl. Sexy new eye shades are banana yellow, baby blue and icy mint. Nails are adorned with soft pink, pure white and iced with varying shades of metallic. Lipstick hues are luscious hues of nursery pink, beige and corals, topped with super gloss for optimum shine. Matte textures are definitely last year's news.

Carol's Tips

Skin care is where it all begins. The extra humidity in the air might cause unwanted blemishes, so use lightly formulated creams as opposed to my winter suggestions. Get ready for summer by doing the four essentials to having great skin — exfoliate, cleanse, treat and moisturize.

Christian Dior's Equite is specifically designed for oily skin. This trio includes a purifying cleansing gel, toner and cleansing mask. It helps eliminate excess sebum and impurities, leaving your skin soft and smooth.

Pamper your body with Dior Svelte Perfect, a new formula to help control cellulite. It promises to be effective within a month, with a firming result in just eight days. For your special guy, Polo Ralph Lauren offers a fabulous facial scrub. After the long winter, his skin might look a little fatigued and dull. This scrub help's remove dirt, grime, clogged pores and ingrown hairs and the result is fresh energized skin.

Lancome's new Renergie oil-free lotion is a lightweight, anti-wrinkle firming complex that leaves your skin plumper and smoother, with a dramatic decrease in the appearance of fine lines and wrinkles.

Bronzewear Tinted Self-Tanner from Clinique is a sheer gel bronzer, so when applied, you see where it goes. No build-up, no missed spots and no regrets. Your face will have an even tan as quickly as you can apply it. After two to three hours, you can remove the bronzer, and like magic, you have a golden tan.

Estee Lauder, re-invents face powder. Lucidity, Enlighten and Double Matte, include loose and pressed powder to suit almost every skin type and shade. These state-of-the art powders will help to set your makeup, reduce shine and will look and feel totally natural without that dry masky appearance — they are an absolute makeup "must." Blush gives you the brightness of spring. Choose a natural color and blend well. Always look like you have a healthy glow.

Prommette from Lancome is a sheer veil of creamy blush for cheeks and eyes. Its transparent formula glides on with a creamy touch, yet has the velvety softness of powder — great for all skin types. Chanel cheeks get the royal treatment with their new color — Golden Beige — it's gorgeous by itself or as a finishing touch. I recently interviewed Tyler Banks and she dusts her whole face with a golden blush. Almay Amazing Lasting Blush is oil free, streak-proof and stays on all day. It's available in eight tantalizing shades.

Eyes that twinkle say it all. Cool pastel blends, gleaming with frosty glitter is the look of the season. Blend shadows well and line your eyes with black for evening or icy blue, yellow or mint for the day.

Sophisticated eyes are a "brush" away with Chanel's Trio, Invincible, apricot, brass and jet (black) all in one compact. It can provide a natural effect or impart a glamorous sultry look.

Clinique's — Stay The Day Eye Shadow is non-creasing, non smudging and really stays put. Its dreamy-like feeling is attributed to lecithin-coated pigments that moisturize and enhance adhesion.

Courageous Liners from Lancome, are absolutely enticing with colors, such as, primary yellow and icy mint, and don't miss Estee Lauder's Social Butterfly collection with fun colors such as, Apply Canary Island and Honolulu blue. Almay Amazing Lasting Eyepencil stays on for 16 hours and is water-resistant — great for those days that never seem to end.

Lips are the most sensuous part of your face. Keep them soft and supple. Top up your favorite colors with clear gloss or frosty sparkle.

Liner and lip color in one plumped-up pencil, Chubby Stick, is the latest news from Clinique. It provides a one stroke application without sacrificing the finished polish of lipstick.

Levres Lamiere Neon is an exceptional creation from Chanel. This beautiful compact contains iridescent, crystalline gloss that enhances your lip's sheer brilliance while capturing and reflecting light.

Elizabeth Arden's Long Wearing Exceptional Lipstick Line introduces the unique shade of Amber, a burnished, sparkly neutral that anybody can wear, either by itself or as a shimmering topper.

Almay Amazing Lasting Lipcolor takes long-wearing lipstick to a new level. This creamy, feel good formula meets the top three need gaps for long-wear, protection and moisture retention.

Hair reflects this seasons light and sheer fashions. Hair designer, Daniel, of Daniel's Salon (25 Bellair) says, "The style is all in the cut. The weight of the hair must be balanced so you can simply wash and towel dry. To achieve a healthy sheen, use a hair moisturizer. Your hair should always enhance you, not your stylist."

During a recent interview with Claudia Schiffer, she shared that her favorite shampoo and conditioner is Revlon's Outrageous.

Fragrance is soft and subtle for spring. Remember all scents smell differently once they are enmeshed with your body chemistry.

Georgio Armani treats us with Aqua Di Gio for men. This intriguing scent exudes mystery, creating a sensuous harmony with water, air and the sun. It's fresh, clean and oh so sexy.

Davidoff, Cool Water Woman, is a burst of sparkling, fresh citrus followed by a bouquet of aquatic florals. This effervesent blend is invigorating, fresh and to befit its name — synonymous with feminity.

Cacharel's Anais Anais is offering us perfume in two distinctly exquisite bottles. One, a precious glass flowerpot and the other an elegant, stemmed flower. These gorgeous gems are only enhanced by the exquisite scent inside the bottle.

From Kevlar to satin, vests making comeback

By PHYLLIS FELDMAN
Special to the CJN

Everyone has a Vested Interest...

Anyone who is minimally aware of fashion can attest that, when it comes to clothing trends, what was once old eventually becomes new again.

Maybe it's a way to reach back and grab a piece of what was safe and warm and comfortable — the same reason why in an ever faster-moving world, the trendiest restaurants are reinventing the mashed potato.

I can't think of another piece of women's clothing that epitomizes this more than the vest. Possibly it's our craving for a leftover tidbit of grandfatherly nostalgia in a lifestyle so full of technomania, that we anticipate its comeback every season. So many of us welcome that extra layer of protection from the cold cruel world when we can get it.

Somewhere between a clothing basic and an accessory, a vest adds a finishing touch to any outfit — pulling the individual pieces together to create a total look. As an alternative to the classic jacket, a vest is the more casual cousin, adding a dash of panache when girls just wanna have fun.

From the ever popular men's pinstripe to western denim, formal brocade to biker leather, Kevlar to satin, there is a vest to suit every occasion and lifestyle.

Coastguard, undercover detective or dominatrix, there's one for you. Found in every type of clothing store from the designer digs on Rodeo Drive to the alternative lifestyle shops on our very own Queen Street West — "Perhaps I could show you a little of something in studded latex?"...You see everyone gets a little nostalgic sometime.

'Shoebox' photos on display

By DOROTHY LICHTBLAU
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Most of us have a collection of family photos hidden in albums, boxes or envelopes, which we occasionally view to connect with past moments. Rarely, though, do we consider that personal history may have wider appeal.

Steven Fistell, however, understood that the hundreds of images his father (Irving) took in the late '40s and in the '50s were "a unique gift that helps explain who I am and from where I have come." Fistell, an artist and art dealer, who lives in Toronto's Bloorcourt area, perceived that Irving's work was beyond the calibre of the family snapshot.

"I wanted this exhibition to give his work the recognition it deserves, both as art and as a valuable cultural record of everyday life."

The Shoebox Collection, at the Photo Passage at York Quay Centre, until April 27, is the realization of Fistell's wish to bring his father's artistry to light. Produced and curated by Fistell, the exhibit is an evocative selection of people and landscapes in Toronto, during the middle of this century.

Born in Montreal, in 1918, Irving Fistell moved to Toronto with his family, in 1927. In the mid-'40s he and his brother, Sam, opened a second-hand shop at 99 Queen St. W., which sold cameras and other goods. It was during this time, spurred by the availability of high-end camera equipment at his store, that Irving developed an interest in photography. Borrowing quality 35 mm equipment, he taught himself the intricacies of lighting and composition, while photographing family, friends and cityscapes. Romantic and whimsical, the black and white pictures wonderfully record an era and specifically the world of the downtown Toronto Jewish-Canadian family in the '50s.

"Who knows how long the hands-on family photo album will survive as more of us choose to record our lives with video," says Steven Fistell. "The dusty old shoebox brimming with memories may soon become a thing of the past."

This lovers' embrace is part of the Shoebox Collection.

Mother's Courage

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Canadian premiere of My Mother's Courage affords a chance to see a unique play about the Holocaust, which, though laced with humor, still defines it in a realistic, tragic way.

There is an inexpressible beauty of language in the drama by George Tabori, the 83-year-old playwright once blacklisted by Senator Joseph McCarthy.

The Theatre Asylum's production is running at Theatre Passe Muraille until March 30. Phone (416) 504-7529.

Tabori writes about how his mother escapes the Nazis one summer day in Budapest in 1944.

After that harrowing day, she goes to her sister's apartment to play gin rummy, as planned, only to be chastised by her unfeeling brother-in-law for being late.

It is these human details that make Tabori's play such a fascinating way of describing a woman's attempt to save one life as thousands of other Hungarian Jews were loaded on to box cars headed for Auschwitz.

Though a hurried reading might suggest that Tabori's mother befuddled a German officer with her brilliant blue eyes, its deeper layers imply that sheer chance and the complexities of human nature were the cause.

In this context, her compliance with the lustful request of a man pressed against her in the round-up train is understandable.

Director Jennifer H. Capraru has assembled a stellar cast including Elizabeth Shepherd as the mother and Richard Partington as the son.

My Mother's Courage is another feather in the cap of Theatre Asylum which has produced Dear Elena and The Gut Girls.

Havana a city to be savored

By JOSEPH SERGE
Travel Editor

HAVANA — Only a two-hour bus ride west from the popular resort of Varadero, lies this ancient city recently declared a World Heritage Sight by UNESCO.

No trip to a resort is complete without spending at least one day in this city of two million people and even one day is hardly enough.

Havana is home to 900 of the island's 1,500 recognized Jews. Almost all observe the Sabbath and get together for community activities. Jews have lived in Cuba for many years (at one time numbering 15,000), but many fled following the revolution.

In 1991, a new law was passed allowing religious communities to organize. There are three functioning synagogues in Havana, the Patronato Synagogue, the Adas Israel Orthodox synagogue and the Sephardi synagogue Shevet Achim.

A trip to the colonial part of the city is like travelling through time. Founded in 1514, the city is replete with ancient cathedrals, palaces and cobblestone paved streets. One street, across from the palace of the Spanish governor, was paved with hardwood to soften the sounds of horse traffic. (The Spanish governor liked to sleep peacefully.)

Book collectors will have a field-day browsing through the many competing stands of second-hand books in this part of the city.

Across from the ancient Cathedral (built in 1777 and recently reopened as a place of worship) is a square where hawkers sell beautiful hand-crafted wooden sculptures at bargain rates. A foot-long sculpture of a woman that took the artist three days to complete was sold for $14. (All tourist transactions in Cuba are in U.S. dollars.)

Far from the maddening crowd of the plaza, is a food market for Cubans. Vegetables, meat and produce are in abundance here and hawkers were eager to let me try samples for free.

Of course, cigars are also in abundance. Best tip is not to buy cigars from the street but from a legitimate place like La Casa Del Habanas (one each in Varadero and Havana) or from the Partagas cigar factory in Havana, which is definitely worth a trip.

Inside the factory, the tour guide will take you through all the steps that go into making the best cigars in the world. In each room 40 to 50 people sit employed beneath framed photographs of Fidel Castro or martyr Che Guevera, either sorting leaves, rolling, pressing or wrapping. One person's job consists solely of sitting at a microphone and reading newspapers or magazines to the employees over a PA system.

No machines are used at all. Each of the cigars is completely handmade.

If you get a chance, visit the Hemingway Marina. This beautiful, modern marina, 20 minutes from the centre of Havana, is a residential resort that provides full docking and technical services for fishing and pleasure craft.

The resort compound contains a nightclub, swimming pools, tennis courts and an outdoor Pizza Nova. If you plan on staying, there are 78 bungalows and houses for you to rent.

And speaking of the famous novelist, drinkers might delight in taking the Hemingway bar hop. (Hemingway lived in Cuba for several years after 1939.) First, there's the tiny Bodeguita del Medio, a graffiti-inscribed, psychedelic hole in the wall. Look for famous signatures and order a mojito, a cocktail of rum, sugar, lime juice and mint leaves.

At La Floridita, sit in Hemingway's favorite chair (now below a framed photograph of Castro congratulating Hemingway on his Nobel Prize award) and try the famous daquiri, rumored to have been invented on these premises. Or if you're feeling really brave try the papa especial, Hemingway's own mix of a double shot of rum, lemon and crushed ice.

Hemingway's former residence here is now a museum. Inside you'll find a wide assortment of the writer's hunting trophies. Outside the museum you'll see the El Pilar, Hemingway's boat made popular in the Old Man and the Sea.

Havana hosts many museums, ranging from culture to colonialism and of course the Museo de la revolucion, which commemorates Castro's rise to power.

Further south, The Plaza de la Revolucion in modern Havana is a wide-open expanse that houses government buildings. It is home to the May Day parade and the place where Castro delivers many of his never-ending speeches.

After a hot day in the sun, nothing can be more soothing than taking a walk along the breezy Malecon, a promenade that runs along the edge of the city. Many Cubans come out for strolls here and are glad to mingle with foreigners over a cerveza. Cubans are highly educated and young people speak English well.

There is plenty of nightlife in Havana, not the least of which is the cabaret show at the Tropicana. There's also plenty of little night clubs and the local musicians are excellent.

Havana should really be savored. There is so much to see and do, it's worth more than a day trip. There are plenty of hotels, all of which are clean and professionally managed. These include the five-star Melia Cohiba and the four-star Canadian-managed Old Man and the Sea.

Joseph Serge travelled to Cuba as a guest of Cubanacan International.

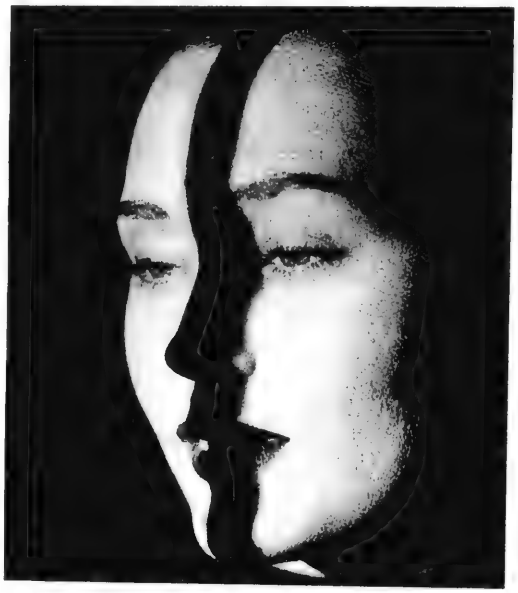
El Al's privatization expected soon

By DAVID HARRIS
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — The long-awaited privatization of El Al will start within the next month, Transport Ministry director-general Nahoum Langental told the Jerusalem Post last week.

"Next week we'll be in a better position to know exactly what the situation is," he said. "But in my opinion we'll be ready within the month."

There appear to be three main sticking points in any decision to privatize: the protection of workers' rights amid fears of job losses; the company's 1996 and early 1997 predicted losses, which could amount to many tens of millions of dollars; and the insistence of Transport Minister Yitzhak Levy that the company not be allowed to fly on Shabbat no matter who owns the airline.



ERWIN BLUMENFELD EXHIBIT

An exhibition of Erwin Blumenfeld's photography runs at the Jane Corkin Gallery 179 John St. Toronto until March 29.

Blumenfeld (1897-1969) took up photography almost by chance in the '20s beginning with portraiture and the nude. From the late '30s to the '60s his work at Harper's, Bazaar and Vogue transformed fashion into high art and he became one of the most successful photographers in the world.

Blumenfeld's experimental and visionary work was a seamless blend of the negative and the positive: taking the picture in the studio and making it in the darkroom. An unusually inventive artist, he developed his own idiosyncratic language, using solarization and negative printing, double and multiple exposures and a host of hybrid techniques.

Throughout the course of his life his interests expanded to include architectural subjects, landscapes and works of art, but photographing "Woman" would remain his chief obsession.

On exhibition are some original works that were Vogue covers in the 1950s. Pictured above is Line on Face from 1949.

'96 March on Vision

March of The Living will be presented in four parts on Vision TV March 24-27 at 2 p.m. as part of the Over The Fence showcase of community programs.

Every two years, United Israel Appeal of Canada takes Canadian teenagers on a tour of Nazi concentration camps and a week in Israel.

In 1996, producer Jim Macgregor accompanied the teenagers and filmed their experiences.

Film News

• The fifth annual Toronto Jewish Film Festival will take place May 1 to 8 at the Bloor Street Cinema. Festival passes are $72 before April 7, $80 afterwards. The first 50 people to buy a pass also receive a free double pass to the movie A Summer in La Goulette opening at the Carlton Cinemas April 18. 416-324-8600.

• The San Francisco Jewish Film Festival has just released a new book, Independent Jewish Film: A Resource Guide, which it calls the most comprehensive work ever published on the subject. At 172 pages, the book gives instructions on how to find more than 400 films and videos and includes a descriptive summary of each one. $29 Cdn 415-621-0556.

Theatre News

• Jewish Theatre Projects offers workshop performances of This Could Be The One! a play that explores the world of contemporary Jewish singles and the struggles they face in their search for love and happiness. Presented in conjunction with Leah Posluns Theatre and the Bathurst Jewish Centre. March 29, 8:30 p.m., and March 30, 1 p.m. Leah Posluns Studio Theatre, North York. $5 in advance, $7 at the door. Tickets available at the Jewish Singles Registry, 55 Eglinton Ave. E. #405, or by calling 905-882-9641.

• Mrs. Warren's Profession by George Bernard Shaw, is at the Tarragon Extra Space, 30 Bridgman Ave., Toronto, March 21 to April 5. Tickets $15. 416-531-1827.

• Medina Theatre Ensemble presents staged readings from familiar plays, March 24, 7:30 p.m., B'nai Brith Building, 15 Hove St., North York. Pay What You Can. Roselle, 416-633-2057.

• Danny Grossman Dance Company premiers two new works inspired by singers Dorothy Maynor and Paul Robeson. Respectively, they are Spiritus and Hear The Lambs A Cryin'. March 25 to April 5, Premiere Dance Theatre, Toronto. Tickets $20 to $32. 416-973-4000.

At the Galleries

Saints and Sinners, a show by Rebecca Cowan, continues at the Open Studio Gallery, 468 King St. W., Toronto, to April 5. Cowan's works have been widely exhibited across North America, most recently at the Holy Blossom Temple. Open Monday to Saturday, 12 to 5. 416-504-8238.

In The Spotlight

Last December, Variety magazine, the daily Bible of the U.S. entertainment industry, included 33-year-old cinematic whiz-kid Lawrence (Larry) Guterman, formerly of Toronto, as one of three directors in its select year-end listing of Multimedia 20 To Watch.

Guterman, the son of Monty and Blema Mazin of North York, first turned heads with his masterful 35-minute film Headless!, which he completed for his master's thesis at a California film school. Even before graduating, Guterman had penned an episode of the TV show Tales From The Crypt and was working on scripts for both Paramount and TriStar.

Hired by cinematic legend Steven Spielberg, Guterman directed the live-action portion of the Goosebumps interactive CD-ROM Escape From Horrorland for Spielberg's Dreamworks Studio, in a co-production with the Microsoft Corp. Released last December, the game reportedly did extremely well over the holiday period and won a favorable mention in Time magazine.

Guterman's newest directorial venture is Ants, an entirely digital feature film being co-produced by Dreamworks and Palo Alto's Pacific Data Images, with a projected release date in early 1998.

Guterman recently spent five hours with Woody Allen in New York, persuading him to lend his voice to the production. Other voices confirmed for Ants include those of Gene Hackman, Sylvester Stallone, Meryl Streep and Sarah Jessica Parker.

USDS Bayview captures day school basketball title

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Maybe it's in the water they drink or maybe it's something in the air, but whatever the reason, USDS Bayview continues to churn out championship teams.

Around the same time the hockey team repeated as winners of the Yitzhak Rabin Memorial Tournament, the basketball squad took top honors in the Jewish Day School Basketball League. In the championship game held at the Bathurst Jewish Centre (BJC), USDS Bayview Warriors defeated arch rivals Bialik 60-45, putting the cap on an unblemished 15-0 season. Last season, USDS lost the final by two points.

This season, "our kids were focused and they knew how to play as a team," said Barbara Tweyman, school vice-principal and "number one basketball fan."

Tweyman credited coaches Jeff Goldstein and Michael Zalev, both USDS grads, for rounding the team into shape and making them a competitive team on a city-wide scale. She pointed out that the Warriors, consisting of students in grades 7 and 8, played one exhibition game against St. Andrews Junior High and won that matchup too.

Despite their accomplishments on the court, the main emphases in the league are sportsmanship and camaraderie among day school students, Tweyman said.

The league, which just concluded its fifth season, includes teams from USDS Bathurst, Associated Finch, Associated Leslie, Bialik, Netivot Hatorah and Leo Baeck. Each team plays a 12-game season beginning in October, with one home game and one away against each school. Playoffs are held on neutral territory at the BJC.

Teammates of the USDS Warriors cheer in celebration after winning the championship game of the Jewish Day School Basketball League.

Warriors' games generate plenty of interest at Bayview. Many "parents, siblings and friends come out to support the team. It's become a wonderful bonding experience," Tweyman said.

Sportsmanship is a key component in games and "we applaud good play for whatever team," she added.

Tweyman suggests Bayview's success might be traceable to the school's "very high emphasis on sports. It helps create a wonderful school spirit and it's another important dimension to school life."

Members of Bayview's champion boys team are: Jeremy Blustein, Jonathan Mandelbaum, Yonatan Refaeli, Evan Marcus, Keven Scheeter, Seth Goldberg, Jonathan Gonsenhauser, Isaac Kessler, David Isaacman, Milton Mednick, Ari Sargon, Michael Wilchesky, David Goldstein, Joel Warsh and Mark Abramowitz.

With the boys' season now over, the girls' day school basketball league is kicking into gear. Its season runs from March through May and features the same schools as the boys' league.

The Inside Back

Discovering new identities in time for Purim

By JORDAN MAX

Once again, it's Purim. You're taking the family to hear the Megillah, but you don't have a costume. No need to worry. Here are a few sure-fire ideas and background information for responding to the inevitable question "And who are you supposed to be?" Of course, costumes are optional; just use your imagination. Chag Purim Samayach!

The Last Laugh

Carpool Woman: Seemingly inexhaustible, this dynamo can singlehandedly cross various time zones with multiple child pick-ups and drop-offs, while carrying on three conversations with passengers. Knows all lyrics to all children's tapes and full weekly schedules of five other households. Expert in timing. Nemesis: Snowsuits, government officials who won't let her put a siren on her van.

Chazzanic Wannabee Man: Provides unsolicited backup vocals for shul-designated chazzan, particularly on Shabbat and yamim tovim. Has memorized all opera arias in Italian; however, is still searching for an Italian-speaking minyan. Once shook hands with Luciano Pavarotti's agent's father-in-law's second cousin. Fulfils secret desire by cruising karaoke bars, but is often shouted off the stage for refusing to relinquish the microphone. Believes that tone deafness should not disqualify someone from leading services. Often claims air is too dry to sing properly anyway. Nemesis: Persons with perfect pitch, choirs.

Kiddush Man: Sharpest elbows in town. Able to consume vast quantities of honey and sponge cake, herring (preferably schmaltz) within nanoseconds of Kiddush being recited after shul on Shabbat morning. Able to detect schnapps within a 10-mile radius. Will often be sighted anytime a kiddush offered. Thrives at wedding sweet tables, even if five-course dinner finished only minutes before. Nemesis: Rabbis with lengthy divrei Torah, shul presidents with announcements.

Metziyah Man: Known for penchant for finding best bargains in town (or beyond), and broadcasting to all within earshot. Can even bargain with food grocers for deals on canned tuna. Happiest when finding things for free even when he can afford to pay. Useful community resource on prices on absolutely anything, even without being asked. Nemesis: Full retail prices, persons who find better metziyahs by any margin.

Pesach Person: A rather agitated person, easily excited and worried about Pesach cleaning and planning once Simchat Torah ends. Measures time by date of first seder. Full of boundless energy and uses vast quantities of household cleaning products. Prefers hand scrubbing to mechanical devices, as more authentic and closer to the action. At fullest potential and happiest during the month of Adar. Will even offer to clean other houses when too effective on home turf. Tends to collapse exhausted sometime during first seder. Nemesis: Pieces of chametz found on erev Pesach, months between Pesach and Sukkot.

Cappucino Man/Woman: Constantly sleep-deprived superhero relentlessly in search of caffeine. Known to frequent coffee bars, coffee and pop machines, donut shops. Expert in art of coffee-making and self-appointed protector of Juan Valdez. Nemesis: Herbal teas, instant coffee.

Cellular/Car Phone Man/Woman: Known for the warbling cry "I'm on the cell phone," this superhero is constantly on the move, searching for someone to call or something to talk about. Especially fond of calling from driveways to announce imminent arrival. Bane of restaurants and movie theatres. Occasionally crashes car into other moving vehicles while engaged in important telephone matters. Most active on evenings and weekends when air time is free. Nemesis: Pay phones.

Internet Supersurfer: Usually found bleary-eyed, this person faithfully pursues computer excitement for the latest software to download, bulletin board or discussion group. Somewhat paranoid about missing a day's e-mail or new entries. Lives for new Web sites. Able to double-click and breathe at the same time. Vulnerable when unconnected or exceeds monthly time limit. Nemesis. People without access.

Supermom/dad: No explanation necessary.

PURIM POPPYSEED CANDY
WE SELL GE FOR LESS

1 lb. poppyseeds
1/2 cup raisins, optional
3/4 cup sugar
1 1/4 cups honey
1 cup nuts
1 pinch salt

Wash poppyseeds thoroughly in boiling water and drain well. Cook all ingredients except nuts and raisins to soft ball stage. Add nuts and raisins and cook for 5 minutes. Pour onto wet board and spread with spatula to about 1/4" thick. Allow to cool for a few minutes and cut into square or diamond shapes. When cool, remove from board. Yield: 36 servings

Recipe of the week

Please feel free to call The CJN and make requests for a favourite dish - we will try to answer. ENJOY!

About Life

Dear Ella,

With Passover quickly approaching, I am always filled with memories of preparing for the holidays with my mother.

My mother, who passed away four years ago, used to make all kinds of wonderful recipes for Pesach. Preparing some of those dishes now, I get a warm comforting feeling. When the kids say things like, "this is bubbie's brisket," it makes me happy knowing that they carry some of those special memories too.

One of the recipes I can't seem to duplicate is a dessert she made with matzos dipped in wine, layered with filling and covered in chocolate. When I think about it, I can almost taste it.

I wish I had taken the time to learn more of her culinary secrets, but it never seemed to be one of my priorities.

I thought maybe one of your readers might have heard of this recipe and be kind enough to forward it on.

Chag Samayach.

Food for Thought

Dear Food for Thought,

Food you shared at home with your family when you felt happy and safe is the ultimate comfort food.

Everyone has a wonderful gefilte fish recipe that bubbie used to make. My mother used to make something she called an "oungebrenteh zip" (translated it would mean "burnt soup"). It was delicious, but that recipe is gone too.

It is important to spend time with our aging parents and grandparents. Take the time to follow them around when they are cooking. You can be sure that most of the time, they are not using a cookbook.

Besides ending up with a delicious recipe, you'll also be spending quality time, something we are all too busy to do sometimes, with our hectic schedules.

These recipes release a flood of memories of childhood and holidays and usually remind us of some of the closest and happiest times we spend with our families.

There is nothing richer than a good memory. Pass on the wealth.

PA involved in Hebron riots

Arafat gave tacit approval for attacks, says Israeli security

By JON IMMANUEL
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — "Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat gave the green light to the radical organizations to carry out attacks," Intelligence Maj.-Gen. Moshe Ya'alon said last week.

Furthermore, Ya'alon added, Palestinian Preventive Security (PPS) chief Jibril Rajoub organized the riots that took place in Hebron over the past few days.

Chief of General Staff Lt.-Gen. Amnon Shahak expanded on Ya'alon's theme, warning that, given the present state of tension, the potential exists for further deterioration following an understanding by Hamas and Islamic Jihad that there is a tacit agreement with the Palestinian Authority (PA) allowing them to carry out terror attacks. The two generals were speaking at a Jerusalem press conference.

Ya'alon said that, while it is difficult to prove that Arafat specifically told the radical Islamic organizations to carry out suicide attacks, he met with the leaders of these organizations upon his return from the United States and gave them to understand that this was his message.

As long as this situation persists, Ya'alon said, another attack can occur. "From our acquaintance with the Palestinian security apparatus, we know it is able to deal with the terrorist organizations, but for them to act there is a need for a clear order from Arafat that has not yet been given."

Ya'alon said that recently the heads of the Palestinian security apparatus had cut off contact with their counterparts in the General Security Service and reduced cooperation to a minimum. He also noted that, until March 21, there had been no suicide attacks for an entire year.

This is no coincidence, he said, but rather the result of action taken by Arafat and the heads of the PPS.

"Today there is no conflict between the PA and Hamas," said Ya'alon.

Jews must stand up for their rights

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A look of annoyance crossed Edgar Bronfman's face. "Jews don't make anti-Semitism," he said sharply. "Anti-Semites make anti-Semitism."

Exclusive Interview

Bronfman, the Montreal-born president of the New York-based World Jewish Congress, was reacting to a question posed during an interview prior to a speech he would deliver to the Canadian Club.

He had been asked whether the World Jewish Congress' widely-publicized campaign to recover confiscated Jewish funds and property from Swiss banks and European governments might not cause an anti-Jewish backlash.

"It's more important for Jews to stand up for their rights," he added. "If we want to earn the respect of the world, we must stand up and be counted."

In line with this thinking, Bronfman, a youthful 67, is writing what many consider the final chapter of the Holocaust. Through a combination of moral suasion and pressure, the World Jewish Congress and the World Jewish Restitution Organization,

The News in Brief

CANADA

Federal Enumeration

OTTAWA – From Thursday, April 10 to Wednesday, April 16, pairs of enumerators will be going door-to-door across 301 federal ridings in Canada to build a permanent register of qualified electors.

The register will contain each elector's name, mailing address, municipal address, electoral district, gender and date of birth.

Electors whose names or addresses are incorrect on the preliminary list or who are not on the list, will have four more days to have the information corrected or to be added.

ISRAEL

Bar-Ilan Mission

RAMAT GAN – Bar-Ilan University will hold a Jewish Identity Leadership Mission from June 15 to 25.

The 10-day excursion will be capped by a visit to Basel, Switzerland, the birthplace of Zionism.

NASA Joins Inquiry

JERUSALEM – National Aeronautics and Space Administration (NASA) scientists are set to use a "supercomputer" to simulate February's collision of two military helicopters in northern Israel.

The panel investigating the crash, in which 73 soldiers and crew were killed, had turned to NASA for assistance in determining its cause, Israeli media reported.

Rabbinic Torah Study

JERUSALEM – Registration has opened for the 11th annual Rabbinic Torah Study Seminar, to be held at the Shalom Hartman Institute in Jerusalem from June 30 to July 10.

The seminar draws rabbis of all Jewish denominations from congregations around the world for 10 days of intensive study.

For more information call 201-894-0566.

WORLD

NIF Contributions Up

WASHINGTON – Contributions to the New Israel Fund in 1996 surpassed the previous year's effort by a wide margin.

The international philanthropy raised $12.9 million last year, 20 percent more than in 1995. Ninety percent of the funds were raised in the United States, with the balance coming from Canada, Western Europe and Israel.

JVC Summer Program

NEW YORK – This June a group of college students and recent graduates will spend six weeks in Israel and Honduras or Zimbabwe living in hands-on development projects, learning about international development and exploring their Jewish identities as part of JVC Summer, a new program of American Jewish World Service's Jewish Volunteer Corps.

For more information call 1-800-889-7146 or fax 212-736-3463.

Argentina Criticized

BUENOS AIRES – Argentine Jews last week commemorated the fifth anniversary of the March 17, 1992 bombing of the Israeli Embassy here with bitter criticism of the government for failing to capture those responsible for the attack.

Some 1,500 people gathered Monday morning across the street from the Argentine Supreme Court to criticize the government's inability to solve the car bombing, which left 29 dead and some 100 wounded.

Bnei Akiva Program

NEW YORK – Bnei Akiva of the United States and Canada will once again be holding its Hachshara program. Designed for students, the program combines kibbutz life with an intensive learning schedule.

For more information call 212-889-5260.

Library Convention

CLEVELAND – The 32nd annual convention of the Association of Jewish Libraries will take place here, June 22 to 25.

For more information call 216-464-4050, ext. 131.

CAJE Conference

PALO ALTO – The Conference on Alternatives in Jewish Education will return to Stanford University in Palo Alto, Calif., for its annual festival of Jewish teaching and learning from Aug. 17 to 21.

Trial Opens for Neo-Nazis

PARIS – Four French neo-Nazis went on trial last week after being accused of going on an anti-Semitic rampage in a Jewish cemetery in 1990.

Support for UJA

NEW YORK – The United Jewish Appeal has announced that all four major streams of Judaism – Orthodox, Conservative, Reform and Reconstructionist – have issued statements expressing full support of the United Jewish Appeal-Federation annual campaign.

EGYPT, U.S.S.R. IN DEBATE ON MIDEAST POLICY

Israel has observed a stiffening in both the Egyptian and Soviet attitudes towards peace, with the Russians now set on getting the Israelis out of the territories. They would prefer this to be by political means, but are not holding back the Egyptians if they decide they must resort to war.

There is, however, a bitter debate going on between Cairo and Moscow. The Egyptians are asking: "How is it that with the most powerful ally in the world and with your experts, advisers and equipment, we cannot beat the Israelis?" The Russians' reply is: "We have given you everything – more than we gave North Korea and Vietnam. Why could you not create a fighting army?"

CANADIAN OLIM OBJECT TO HOUSING COSTS

Two associations representing immigrants from North America and Britain to Israel have protested bitterly over the high cost of housing in Israel and demanded that the government do something about it without delay.

The convention of the Association of Americans and Canadians in Israel called on the government and the Jewish Agency to implement "a radical change" in the present housing policy.

Bronfman maintains quest for stolen Jewish funds

'No one will profit from the Holocaust'

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Edgar Bronfman, president of the World Jewish Congress, says he will spare no effort to track down confiscated Jewish wealth in Europe.

"I'm very serious in saying that, as long as I draw breath, no one will profit from the Holocaust," he told the Canadian Club in a recent speech.

Bronfman, who is also president of the World Jewish Restitution Organization, has played a central role in persuading Swiss banks and various European governments to return money and property to their rightful private and communal owners.

Edgar Bronfman

"This is not about money but about justice," he declared.

Bronfman, who flew in from New York City for the event, took note of the fact that Swiss banks and the Swiss government have agreed to establish special short-term and long-term funds to assist victims of the Holocaust and other catastrophes.

But he acknowledged that the World Jewish Congress has yet to determine the fate of monies deposited by Jews in Swiss banks before World War II.

Bronfman expressed the hope that Switzerland will support historical commissions presently studying Switzerland's role during the war.

He said these panels will, among other things, determine the degree to which the war was prolonged by the export of Swiss strategic materials to Germany.

He said he was optimistic that $70 million (US) worth of stolen gold bullion, shipped from Nazi Germany to Switzerland during the war and now stored in bank vaults in the United States and Britain, will eventually be turned over to the World Jewish Restitution Organization and then distributed to needy survivors.

In an anecdotal vein, Bronfman recalled how he had enlisted the help of U.S. President Bill Clinton and his wife to exert pressure on the Swiss to be more forthcoming and generous with regard to unclaimed Jewish bank deposits in the country.

Twice previously, in the 1960s and 1970s, Swiss banks made payments to Jewish organizations acting on behalf of Jews murdered during the Holocaust. But these transfers were paltry, forcing the World Jewish Congress to act, he suggested.

In a 1995 meeting in Berne, a consortium of Swiss bankers offered the World Jewish Congress a lump sum of $32 million (US) to make amends for the past.

Bronfman said he rebuffed them, saying he had not come to discuss "money but process." These talks led to further negotiations and more positive results, he noted.

Bronfman said the World Restitution Organization is currently engaged in discussions with a whole host of countries ranging from France and Norway to the Czech Republic and Poland. Some of the negotiations have gone better than others, he conceded.

The World Jewish Congress, he disclosed, recently persuaded Germany to extend its reparation payments by $180 million annually to meet the needs of Jewish survivors in Eastern Europe.

Taking a close look at a UN resolution

Whether or not one believes that the UN will become increasingly more relevant in a world devoid of the competitions of the Cold War, one must still bear in mind that most of the people of the underdeveloped, or, Third World have frequent and a direct contact in their daily lives with at least some department of the many-faceted UN bureaucracy. For most of the people of the earth then, the UN enjoys a measure of credibility. It carries a certain prestige other than, simply, the large "cereal box" by the East River in New York where diplomats bargain, posture and exploit their immunity from prosecution by not paying their parking tickets.

As The CJN pointed out last week, on the very day, March 13, that a Jordanian soldier massacred seven Israeli girls and wounded six more, the UN General Assembly passed a resolution by a vote of 130 in favor; two opposed (Israel and the United States), and two abstentions (Marshall Islands and Micronesia) which criticized Israel's decision to build a housing project on Har Choma.

Canada voted with the majority.

Across my desk last week, I received the March 12 draft of the text of that resolution. As far as I know, there were no changes between the draft version and the one which was voted upon the following day. Its contents, I believe, would be of interest to CJN readers. I shall therefore excerpt some of it.

There is, of course, a formula, a protocol, in writing UN resolutions. The nub of a resolution is at the end. But preceding that nub is always a preamble which provides the background, or describes the "atmosphere" as it were, which led up to the resolution in the first place.

But that atmosphere is always described according to the purposes of the sponsors of the resolution.

Thus for example, we read the following description in the preamble to the resolution. (All commentary is mine and appears in Italics.)

"Expressing deep concern at the decision of the Government of Israel to initiate new settlement activities in the Jebel Abu Ghneim area in East Jerusalem."

The underlining is part of the original text. Notice how the very terms of the debate, such as "new settlement activities," and especially "Jebel Abu Ghneim area in East Jerusalem," are taken from the Palestinian side. Referring to the project as a "new settlement" brings immediate negative associative connotations. There is no reference to the Hebrew name for the hill, Har Choma, as if it only has an Arab identity. Nor is there a reference to the fact that the vast majority of the land in question was expropriated from Jewish owners who had purchased it in the early 1970s.

"Stressing that such settlements are illegal and a major obstacle to peace."

It is by no means true that the building project, or as the UN referred to it, the "settlement" is illegal. Nor is it true that it is an obstacle to peace. But the points are included, mantra-like, to set the stage.

"Confirming that legislative and administrative measures and actions taken by Israel which purport to alter the status of Jerusalem, including expropriation of land and properties thereon, are invalid and cannot change that status."

This provision is a direct challenge to the policies adopted by every Israeli government since 1967 regarding the indivisibility of Jerusalem as the capital of Israel.

The four parts of the resolution are:

1. Calls upon the Israeli authorities to refrain from all actions or measures, including settlement activities, which alter the facts on the ground, pre-empting the final status negotiations, and have negative implications for the Middle East Peace Process;

2. Calls upon Israel, the occupying Power, to abide scrupulously by its legal obligations and responsibilities under the Geneva Convention...which is applicable to all the territories occupied by Israel since 1967;

3. Calls upon all parties to continue, in the interests of peace and security, their negotiations...;

4. Requests the Secretary-General to bring to the attention of the Government of Israel the provisions of this resolution."

The entire purpose of this resolution was to discredit Israel's reliability as a peace partner, to paint it as actually a threat to peace and to undermine Israel's claim to an undivided Jerusalem.

And yet, Canada chose to support it.

After the vote, undoubtedly somewhat self-conscious at the terrible coincidence of the vote and the Naharayim massacre, Canada officially explained its vote in the following text:

"Canada is deeply saddened and shocked by the attack against innocent Israeli school children today in Jordan and we too extend our condolences to their families. Such deplorable acts of violence must not be allowed to derail the peace process. We believe that maintaining the current peace process is essential and hope the parties will resume negotiations shortly towards the achievement of a just, lasting and comprehensive peace based on Security Council resolutions 242 and 338.

"Canada has voted in favor of the resolution just adopted. We would note, however, that both parties involved in the peace agreements have obligations, and we would have preferred to see that reality reflected more fully in the resolution. As Canada noted in its 6 March statement before the Security Council, the construction of a lasting peace requires that all parties refrain from unilateral actions that would prejudice the outcome of final status negotiations. In this regard, it is Canada's view that the recent decision of the Government of Israel to proceed with the construction of an Israeli settlement in Har Choma—Jebel Abu Ghneim undermines the trust that is the very foundation of the peace process. Canada views settlement activity as a violation of international law and as harmful to the peace process."

But in the official record of the proceedings, when people will be interested to look up only the tally, the vote will show 130-2-2. And they will observe that Canada voted with the majority.

Purim Spiels

Our special Purim coverage in last week's issue was an overwhelming success. However, we did receive three calls and one letter of complaint. Most of our readers were able to see immediately that the briefs and the stories about the amalgamation of the shuls, the anti-assimilation tomato, the merger of Congress and B'nai Brith and Rabbi Obergegessen were Purim spiels. Next year we hope to repeat and to improve our Purim coverage. But we will try to show even more prominently which of the stories will be, simply, spiels.

Frustration evident at annual vigil for agunot

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Gone were the placards of previous years. Toronto's fourth annual vigil for agunot, with an audience of about 75 people seated in rows of chairs in a Lipa Green Building room, seemed subdued, by contrast.

But it soon became evident that frustrations were simmering and the desire to help women denied a Jewish divorce by their husbands has held strong.

Educator Marsha Razin opened the program, held on the eve of the Fast of Esther, with a fiery speech denouncing recalcitrant husbands and their enablers as defilers of God's name.

Razin, whose husband of almost 35 years was one of the half-dozen men in the audience, dates her interest in the issue to a chance meeting with an agunah 25 years ago. "In her suffering she took away my innocent confidence in the simplicity of a halachic lifestyle."

Rabbi faces barrage of questions

Rabbi Mark Dratch of Shaarei Shomayim Congregation, the only rabbi to have attended the Toronto vigils, was effectively prevented from finishing his speech by a barrage of questions reflecting frustration but not hostility. Audience members wondered aloud to which of his colleagues they would be able to turn after he leaves Toronto this summer to take up a new pulpit in Connecticut.

Defending his Beth Din (rabbinic court) colleagues as men of integrity, dedication and sincerity, Rabbi Dratch noted that Toronto's Vaad Harabonim has issued at least one public notice denying a recalcitrant husband honor in the community.

"You know what happened to him?" an audience member whispered bitterly. "He didn't get an aliyah. Tsk. Tsk."

Rabbi Dratch cautioned that change will not come about quickly. He urged people not to take "a critical approach" to the rabbinate. "All you'll succeed in doing is creating greater divisiveness. There has to be greater dialogue, greater sensitivity to the Halachah."

Women who are denied a get (Jewish divorce) are not permitted to remarry according to Jewish law. Should they bear children in a subsequent relationship without obtaining a get, the children, while halachically Jewish, are considered mamzerim and are permitted to marry only a restricted category of other Jews.

Men can avail themselves of halachic loopholes if their wives don't (or can't) agree to accept a get, although Rabbi Dratch noted they apply only in rare circumstances.

He disagreed with the oft-quoted aphorism, attributed by Razin to Orthodox activist/rebbitzen Blu Greenberg, that "if there's a rabbinic will, there's a halachic way."

"A woman needs to come out of the get process viewed as a single woman by the entire Jewish community," said Rabbi Dratch. "If part of the community says they don't accept [a particular rabbi's] get, I don't think it would be responsible to suggest [that route] if segments of the community will not accept her as a divorced woman."

To lessen the possibility that a woman will become an agunah, Rabbi Dratch recommends use of a prenuptial agreement. Versions of two such documents endorsed by the Rabbinical Council of America have been offered at Shaarei Shomayim for the past two years. (The documents are not universally accepted, however, he admitted.)

Under the terms of the Canadianized prenuptial agreement, based on a document written 700 years ago, the husband is obligated to pay his wife $200 per day (indexed to the Consumer Price Index) from the time they begin to live apart until their get is final.

"Every day he refuses to give the get, it's another $200, and it can add up rather quickly." The conditions are considered "incentive" rather than "coercion," explained Rabbi Dratch. The latter can render a get void.

He called on parents and grandparents to let engaged couples know about such documents "to create a mood in which blackmail for a get and withholding a get is just not acceptable."

The vigil was co-chaired by Esther Rodzynek and Ophira Sone of the Toronto chapter of the International Coalition for Agunah Rights (ICAR). The nine constituent member groups of ICAR were joined this year by new member the Women's League for Conservative Judaism.

Agunah vigils were also held in Calgary, Winnipeg and Montreal.

Peace with Syria said unlikely soon

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It is difficult to be optimistic in the short term about peace between Israel and Syria, John McNee, Canada's ambassador to Syria, said recently.

Syria is insisting on withdrawal by Israel of "every inch" of the Golan and southern Lebanon for any peace deal, and their policy is firm, McNee told the Israel affairs committee of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region (CJC).

"There will be no peace in the Middle East without Syria," he said.

Syria's President Hafez al-Assad is against any separate peace between Israel and Lebanon, he said.

McNee faced some tough questions about whether Israel could safely give up the Golan, whether Canada was acting to prevent terrorists from Syria slipping through the immigration net and why Canadian Jews are being denied admission to Syria.

In reply, McNee said the Golan is not as important to Israel's security as it was 30 years ago, that the Canadian Embassy is trying to prevent terrorists from reaching Canada and that few Syrian visitors to Canada apply for refugee status here.

On the issue of Ontario region president Moshe Ronen and former CJC president Irving Abella both being denied entry to Syria, McNee said he is hopeful that in the long run, Syria will develop a more tolerant attitude to Canadian Jews.

In support, he cited the fact that he was the first Canadian diplomat with a record of service in Israel ever accepted by Syria, and that Canada's ambassador to Israel, a Jew, was invited to a conference in Damascus.

Both Israel and Syria are waiting for the United States to make some decisions on Middle East peace issues. But the Canadian ambassador said it was important to get peace negotiations going again, "because when there are no negotiations, things get worse."

Syria realizes, he said, that it can have normal relations with United States only if there is peace with Israel.

In McNee's opinion, a peace deal fell through when the late Yitzhak Rabin was in power, because "Israel tried to get too much too fast" and Assad thought he had more time to negotiate since he did not foresee that Shimon Peres would lose the election.

Another factor, he said, is that Syria has been "too quick to judge the intentions" of the new government.

Netanyahu following public opinion, says journalist

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Observers of the Israeli political scene should not be surprised by Benjamin Netanyahu's apparent shifts from traditional Likud policy nor by occasional bumps in the road towards peace, the annual meeting of Canadian Friends of Peace Now (CFPN) was told last week.

The Israeli prime minister is an astute politician with his finger on the pulse of the nation and his policies reflect Israeli public opinion, said Patrick Martin, foreign editor of the Globe and Mail.

"Netanyahu represents accurately the wishes of the Israeli population... What really has happened was that the people of Israel in the majority came to recognize the PLO, the agenda of the PLO and a peace process that envelops Syria," he said.

Speaking to about 75 people at the Lodzer Centre in North York, Martin said the key to changing Israeli foreign policy is by changing Israeli public opinion. Quoting former U.S. secretary of state Henry Kissinger, Martin said Israel does not have a foreign policy, it has only domestic politics. Pressure from the United States and critical UN resolutions will not sway Israel's foreign policy, he said.

Arab leaders have come to understand that fact. That accounts in large measure for King Hussein's recent gesture of prostrating himself before the families of the seven schoolgirls killed by a Jordanian soldier. A canny politician, King Hussein is now the most popular political figure in Israel, he noted.

Broad political support for Har Choma development

Even Yasser Arafat has adopted that way of thinking. That's why Palestinian protests over the Har Choma development have been peaceful, Martin continued.

Recounting Netanyahu's recent political decisions that attracted condemnation from around the world, Martin noted they had broad domestic support. The opening of the second doorway to the tunnel adjacent to the Temple Mount was a popular decision in Israel despite the casualties that resulted after the Arab protests, he said.

The decision to withdraw from much of Hebron was also supported by the majority of Israelis, who don't want 400 settlers in the centre of the city or even 4,000 in nearby Kiryat Arba to stand in the way of their dream of peace in the Middle East, he said.

Patrick Martin

Netanyahu, suffering from domestic scandals, agreed to the Har Choma development because he knew it too had "broad popular support." As a result, he received the backing of the Knesset right wing and of the more hawkish members of Labor.

Martin pointed out the Har Choma development, slated for land that was historically part of the municipality of Bethlehem, was originally planned by the previous Labor government. In January, Labor threatened a no confidence motion in the Knesset if Netanyahu didn't go ahead with it.

In giving the green light to Har Choma, Netanyahu also recognized that "the fight is on, the debate is really beginning" over the future of Jerusalem. It also explains why he proposed last week to jump to final status talks, knowing he had a broad domestic consensus to keep Jerusalem as Israel's undivided capital.

Netanyahu and Likud have come a long way in recent years, accepting the Oslo peace process with its acceptance of land for peace and withdrawal from territory in Judea and Samaria, he noted. Though contrary to historic Likud policy, it reflected the sea change in attitudes among the Israeli populace, he suggested.

Martin levelled a muted criticism of Peace Now as well, saying that even if it doesn't like all of Likud's policies, "don't blame Netanyahu. He's just the messenger."

Earlier, Simon Rosenblum, co-president of CFPN, acknowledged that Netanyahu had moved "farther than we thought," though it appears he thinks he can cut a deal by giving up only half the West Bank. CFPN believes "peace can't be purchased at such a bargain basement price," he said.

Instead, he pointed to a possible final settlement discussed by the previous Labor government that would see Israel retain about 10 percent of the territory, which is home to 65 percent of the settlers.

"That's a snapshot of what it would take to get a just and lasting peace," Rosenblum said.

Child survivors gather for 'emotion-laden' conference

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Child survivors of the Holocaust — "evicted" from their childhoods — often live with the feeling of "impending doom" for Jews, a local expert told a conference here last week.

Andre Stein, author of a book on children who were hidden during the Holocaust and himself a child survivor, told a day-long conference on Holocaust-related trauma that many children who survived World War II live with repressed pain.

"They hurt in silence," Stein, a University of Toronto professor and psychotherapist, told a workshop on the impact of the Holocaust on survivor generations. The session was part of the three-day annual meeting in Toronto of the American Orthopsychiatric Association.

The emotion-laden workshop, attended by about 50 mental health care workers, local survivors and members of the second and even third generations, explored how the Holocaust has affected subsequent generations.

But it lingered on the question of child survivors, those who were about 20 in 1945, because, as Stein noted in his presentation, "they had no childhoods."

Child survivors "grew up too quickly, and often had to endure the trauma of their elders." Thus, many children of child survivors "became parents to their parents."

Even as adults, child survivors often harbor feelings of abandonment, especially if one or both parents died in the war, he said. And they often fear that harm to Jews is just around the corner.

The conference was chaired by Eva Metzger Brown, a psychotherapist at the University of Massachusetts, and herself a child survivor.

Brown, whose own practice deals with abrupt loss, such as death and divorce, said all Holocaust survivors were traumatized to some degree.

She and Stein listed the various emotional traits which have been passed down from survivors to their children, and in some cases, even to grandchildren: fear of authority and separation, overprotectiveness and guilt for having survived. Members of the second and third generations have been found to internalize fear and anger and to avoid dealing with adversity, Stein said.

It's important, Brown noted, for survivor families to "break through the silence" that often envelopes them.

On the other hand, the workshop was told, research has shown that children and grandchildren of survivors are high-functioning, largely because of parents' pressure to achieve and succeed.

Many children of survivors, Brown pointed out, "are heavily involved in tikkun olam (the repair of the world), working in areas like health care, anti-racism and poverty.

While child survivors' stories of loss are "different," the experiences of the second and third generations are "important and essential," Brown said, "and they must be heard."

A PASSION FOR PASSOVER

The Parents' Association of Associated Hebrew Schools is presenting A Passion for Passover featuring Greta Rosen of Chillis 'n Meringue on Wednesday, April 2, at the Kamin Education Centre, 300 Atkinson Ave. at 7 p.m. The program will include cooking demonstrations on what to prepare for Passover, sharing of recipes, samples and door prizes. Seen here (from left) is Greta Rosen, Stephanie Kepecs and Ellen Markin.

Hypocrite's lament

It is disheartening to read of Palestinian celebrations over the suicide bombing in Tel Aviv last week in which three Israeli women were killed and scores of individuals were hurt. To be sure, only a minority of Palestinians appear to greet as "good news" the craven tactics of terror. Nevertheless, it is a sullen and ominous testament to the abject failure of Palestinian leadership, and in particular the leadership of Yasser Arafat, that any Palestinians should sing praises for the killing and attempted killing of Jews.

Arafat attempted to cast responsibility for the murders upon the government of Israel, characterizing the bomb's blast as the inevitable eruption from the build-up of volcano-like pressure in the preceding two weeks. But, in doing so, he was behaving deplorably and hypocritically.

We deplore his attempt to absolve the murderer, and those who sent him, of the consequences of their grisly act. We deplore too his pious, self-serving, but deceitful lament of heightened tension when he, more than anyone, was the fomenter of that tension. He complained loudly and vituperatively to any western media outlet that would provide a video camera about Israeli decisions to which he had already provided his written consent.

For example, he complained about Israel's decision to withdraw from "only" nine percent of West Bank territory, even though the Hebron agreement confers upon Israel alone the right to decide the extent of the IDF withdrawal. He also complained about Har Choma, even though he knows there is no prohibition whatsoever in the Oslo agreements against Israeli construction in Jerusalem during the "interim" status period. Most menacingly of all, he released Hamas leaders unto their hateful flock even though he knew, or should have known, that their aim would be incitement to murder more Jews.

And indeed, more Jews have been murdered.

Without the confidence of the people of Israel, there will be no peace with the Palestinian people. And yet, how can Israelis repose any confidence in a man who spurns written agreements and is either unable or unwilling to eliminate terror against them? Thus, Arafat's lament that the peace process is in danger is a hypocrite's lament. If anyone kills the peace process, it will be him.

Har Choma is not Calvary

While foreign cameras clicked and recorded their images for imminent transmission to the far corners of the world, a cross was implanted into the earth of Har Choma last week with an appropriately suffering Palestinian tied to its beams. The image of this modern crucified "martyr" was startling and alarming. And it was certainly no coincidence that the play was enacted while the Archbishop of Canterbury, along with 38 other leading bishops and archbishops of the Church of England, were visiting Jerusalem.

The attempt to associate in the western mind the image of the crucifixion of Christ with the "crucifixion" of the Palestinians was beneath contempt.

For two millennia, the Passion at Calvary was the filter paper through which Jewish blood spilled onto the pages of world history. To invoke that image is nothing less than a brazen, cheap, but insidious propaganda ploy.

THE FIRST ZIONIST CONFERENCE, BASEL 1897

"The confidence of the government with which we want to negotiate regarding the settlement of Jewish masses on a large scale can be gained by frank language and upright dealing."

What is meant by 'non-Jewish Jew'?

The "non-Jewish Jew" concept that so irked Dr. Georges F. Novak (Objects to use of "non-Jewish" Jew, letter to the editor, Feb. 27), nowadays forms a standard scholarly tool for measuring the distance separating a person of (formally defined) Jewish origin from the sum total of his group's premises shared by the majority of its members (the larger the distance, the more "non-Jewish" is the particular Jew in question). The concept was first coined by Isaac Deutcher who used it to describe Jewish socialists who chose utopian (socialist) principles over the values of their own group and has been used, directly or by implication, by scholars such as Ivan Kalmar (The Trotskys, Freuds, and Woody Allens), Barry Rubin (Assimilation and its Discontents), and Sander Gilman (Jewish Self-Hatred), to name but a few.

Equally important, the concept applies no value preference to persons who rank either "high" or "low" on this measure of estrangement from Judaic tradition, as it only seeks to locate the position of various groups on that scale for comparison purposes of the social-scientific variety. In World War II, for example, Nazi atrocities included, without discrimination, Jews stretching across the entire identification spectrum with no exceptions made for either strongly or weakly identified Jews.

Furthermore, everyone knows that a converted Jew who practised Catholicism may have suffered as a Jew in the hands of the Nazis (as did Novak and his family) in equal or greater measure to a Jew born "formally" as such. Novak erred when he likened the application of the "non-Jewish Jew" concept to a denial of his own share of suffering during World War II. Nor did my profiling of elements of history and demography of the Czechoslovak Jewish community in reference to the larger question of Jewish survival have anything to do with "calling" Novak a "non-Jew of the Jewish variety." (The merits of my analysis must stand or fall in disassociation from Novak's or, for that matter, any other single person's individual biography.)

The Jewish stand on poverty

I was deeply touched by two of the articles (CJN, Feb. 27), which seemed profoundly connected.One was on "child poverty is a moral issue" by Gordon Wolfe and the other was "from the editor's desk."

First I read the words, "When man grasps that unity pervades all of Creation, and that he is connected through true unity to all that has been created, then will he love his fellow man...." Then I read about the 1.3 million Canadian children living in poverty, hungry for what the rest of us take for granted. If as a Jew I believe in the first words, then I can only feel shame about the second.

How can we possibly be "connected through true unity," when we allow our children to go hungry?

Whether we are affiliated or secular Jews, we are people who hold dear universal morals. It is time to demonstrate that we will not stand by, knowing that "poor children go to school without breakfast and to bed without supper."

Har Choma housing bedevils peace

Your March 13 editorial, "One voice: Jerusalem" suggests that the vast majority of Israelis support the Netanyahu government's decision to build the controversial Jewish housing project in Har Choma. In fact, according to recent opinion polls reported in Yediot Aharonot (2-25-97) and Ha'aretz (3-5-97), a majority of Israelis favor either postponing or not building these housing units.

Going ahead with this construction on the southeastern edge of Jerusalem is obviously throwing a major monkey wrench into the peace process and fails to recognize that, within the context of Jerusalem remaining the undivided capital of Israel, Palestinians in East Jerusalem will need some linkage to the emerging Palestinian state. While waging the battle for Jerusalem, both sides are engaged in unhelpful practices counter to the spirit of Oslo.

The coverage of Israel in The Toronto Star

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Why, it is often asked, does Israel — the size of New Jersey and with a population roughly that of greater Philadelphia — generate the kind of breathless headlines and ample reporting one finds in the general Western media almost every day? Why aren't other countries under the same intense scrutiny? Why not China, with its one billion people? Or the United States? Does the amount of coverage of dot-on-the-map Israel in and of itself indicate a bias?

The answers are myriad and complex, and have been discussed extensively by such U.S. commentators as Thomas L. Friedman and Charles Krauthammer. Both have suggested a number of reasons why Western media seem obsessed with Israel: its strategic location and countervailing role as the region's sole democracy; its historic and religious significance for three of the world's great faiths; and the very nature of the press. (Krauthammer goes so far as to suggest that the "conscious deployment" of a double standard directed at Israel is not a higher standard — it is a discriminatory standard.)

This article will examine the extent of coverage of Israel in Canada's largest daily newspaper, the Toronto Star. It is not a content analysis of the Star's reporting from or about Israel, but an attempt to explore why the paper devotes as much space to Israel as it does.

Understanding the Star's stance on Israel requires some background in how journalists think and work in general. It also helps to understand how Israel often can't help but attract all this attention.

"Jews are news." It's an axiom of journalism, although you're not likely to actually hear it in any newsroom. Many journalists are naturally drawn to stories that involve Jews, because they're often dramatic and make for good copy.

Journalists are also a suspicious lot, and are attracted to wars, conflict and mayhem like bees to honey. Simply put, bad news sells. A U.S. radio correspondent once pointed out that much of a foreign reporter's work is crisis coverage, and Israel has known little else but crisis since its founding. As well, reporters assigned to a single place tend to pursue stories as a pack, for fear of being "scooped."

As a democracy with its own lively press, Israel does not turn away reporters. According to a 1989 study by the Hebrew University, Israel ranks eighth in the world in accrediting full-time foreign correspondents, with about 200. However, Israel does have the world's largest foreign press corps on a per capita basis.

Israel also offers journalists the essentials they would lack in Arab countries: relative safety, access to officials, government press releases issued in English and the freedom to report on a hot story with impunity.

Reporters cover Israel because they can. They do not cover Algeria, for example, because reporters there are routinely threatened with death.

That openness, coupled with the workings of the press, has translated thus: A CJN survey found that in 1996, a heavy news year in the Middle East, the Toronto Star devoted the following to Israel, Palestinians and/or the Arab/Israeli conflict:

• 22 editorials, a tie with those on the United States and/or U.S.-Canada relations. As most media consumers know, it is editorials which most accurately reflect a newspaper's philosophy. By comparison, the Star ran six editorials on other Mideast nations (including Iraq, Iran and Syria); 11 on African countries; nine on Russia and/or Chechnya; five on central and South America; and three on China. There were 49 other editorials on foreign countries, NATO and the United Nations, with several each on India, the conflict in Northern Ireland and the war in Bosnia. Of the Star's 152 editorials on non-Canadian subjects, 15 percent mentioned Israel or Palestinians. By contrast, the Globe and Mail ran 181 editorials on foreign matters, 13 of which, or just over seven percent, dealt with Israel/Palestinians.

• 125 stories by the Star's Middle East bureau chief, Martin Regg Cohn, averaging one every three days. Of those, 30 were written from the Palestinian autonomous areas, the security zone in southern Lebanon, Egypt and Syria. The rest originated from the West Bank and various Israeli cities (mainly Jerusalem) and settlements.

• 32 opinion pieces on the paper's "op-ed" page, written by foreign news analysts Stephen Handelman and Richard Gwyn, and former Middle East bureau chief Gordon Barthos. Some were by guest writers.

• 22 stories and features prominently displayed in the paper's weekend Context or Insight sections.

• eight stories written by Star staff other than Cohn, mainly about Israeli leaders' visits abroad.

Overkill? Or has the extent of the coverage been appropriate in a year that saw peace talks progress dramatically, as well as an Israeli election? The CJN attempted to get some answers from Star publisher John Honderich, who ultimately determines the paper's content, but he declined to be interviewed for this story.

Peter Goodspeed, the paper's foreign editor, explained the coverage this way: The conflict in the Middle East may be a regional one, he allowed, "but it's also a fascinating story. It's the story of mankind."

Apart from its deeply entrenched religious, historical and cultural importance, Goodspeed said, the region gets the coverage it does because readers seem to want it that way.

He admitted he's never seen the internal marketing surveys indicating what readers actually want, but he claimed that if anything, Star readers want more Mideast coverage, not less.

Why? "Because it's got all the elements of a major story and it affects an awful lot of people in this part of the world. There are a lot of people in Toronto who have family or connections with Israel or the Arab countries. It's a potential nuclear flashpoint. There are hundreds of economic reasons we should be interested. It ranks right up there as one of the major stories in the world."

So Israel has all the ingredients for a good story. But another reason for the Star's abundant coverage, Goodspeed said, is that its Mideast bureau is located in Jerusalem. "That drives part of it. Our European bureau is in London, so we get an awful lot of British copy." As well, the Star's six other foreign bureau reporters "have a much wider swath of the world to cover."

For Cohn, the territories, Gaza, Hebron and all the other hot spots are just minutes away. Couple that with the difficulty of travelling to Arab countries from Israel, and we see more coverage of Israel than, say, of Iran, Syria or Libya.

Goodspeed said he's "never had a complaint" about the extent of coverage. "It's probably been the other way — that people would rather we do these type of stories."

Of course, none of this explains why editors routinely choose to give Israel-related stories front-page play, when articles, for example, on continuing massacres in Algeria, where hundreds have been brutally murdered in the battle with Muslim fundamentalists, merit inch-long items in the world briefs section.

Goodspeed said there's "good reason" there's been so little coverage of the butchery in Algeria: the situation there is so dangerous that journalists, some of whom have been murdered, simply avoid it. Reporting about the country is usually done by telephone from Cairo and even Paris, resulting in very sketchy and scant coverage.

For Moshe Ronen, chair of Canadian Jewish Congress' Ontario region, the Star devotes an "inordinate" amount of attention to Israel.

Ronen is "convinced" the Star's reporting on Israel and its placement of stories amount to "advocacy journalism," arising from what the paper views as Israeli intransigence. But what concerns him more is that the paper is using Israel to reinforce and advance its own concerns about human rights and civil liberties.

"We find that quite disconcerting," he said.

Simon Rosenblum, the Toronto-based national co-chair of Canadian Friends of Peace Now, concurs that the Middle East "clearly gets more ink that any other place in the world." On Israel, "the Globe and Mail has been tough but fair. While the Star's intentions are honorable, I think it is not sufficiently mindful of how things might look from an Israeli point of view."

For Harry Wolfe, president of the central region of Likud Canada, an "irony" of the Star's coverage came last month, when 73 Israeli soldiers died after two transport helicopters collided, and the story was pushed off page 1 by the verdict in O.J. Simpson's civil trial.

"G-d forbid if Israel had done something. That definitely would have been front-page news."

Paul Michaels, director of communications for the Canada-Israel Committee, has for years imparted to the Star's senior editors and other media outlets the need to treat Israel with proportion, fairness and accuracy. The seeming disproportionate coverage at the Star, he says, is not unique to that paper, noting it also exists, to even greater degrees, in newspapers in Britain and the United States.

The Star, Michaels says, has long been concerned with human rights and has advocated the establishment of an independent Palestinian state. Marry that with all the raw drama Israel produces and a general shift in the perception of Jews in Western media from stateless victims to empowered "victimizers," and reporters have an irresistible, seemingly bottomless story.

However, he goes on, the more serious problem in the general media is the tendency to focus on the negative. Bad news is considered "good news," that is, good for the bottom line.

Many longtime Star watchers point to a telling convocation address then-publisher Beland Honderich delivered at Carleton University in 1989, as conveying an insight into the paper's philosophy:

"No self-respecting newspaper deliberately distorts or slants the news to make it conform to its own point of view," Honderich said in accepting an honorary degree. "But you cannot publish a newspaper without making value judgments on what news you select to publish and how you present it in the paper. And these value judgments reflect a view of society — a point of view, if you will — that carries as much weight, if not more, than what is said on the editorial page."

The question, then, for Jewish readers is whether the way in which the Star chooses to cover Israel reveals a value judgment about the Star itself.

Masada's mantra worth second look

By Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

Looking through albums of trips to Israel, I came upon one picture of my three children among the stately ruins of Hazor. Other ruin-hopping has taken us from the tower of Masada, site of the Zealots last stand, to Tsipori in the Galilee, once the site of the court of Judah ha-Nasi (the Prince) and home to scholars of the mishnaic period.

These sites represent two different, indeed incompatible, attitudes towards Judaism, the Jewish State and the survival of the Jewish people.

Masada is well-known to even young school children. Retreating from the smoking ruins of Jerusalem, the Zealots led by Ben Yair, took refuge in the mountain fortress built by Herod. For three years they held out, fortified by the vast stores of food and water there and protected from the Romans camped below them by the inaccessibility of the craggy peak.

Eventually Masada fell, as Romans swarmed up the earthen ramp built by hapless Jewish slaves and broke into the fort. They found that the Zealots had taken their own lives rather than be captured. Josephus gives us a wonderful account of the speech made by Eleazar Ben Yair just before the mass suicide (based, we assume, on survivors' accounts and Josephus' own vivid imagination). Since then, Masada represents a heroic answer to the suppression of Jewish nationalism.

The fall of Masada has presented us with a heroic picture — but it is worth a second look. The Zealots had carried out a campaign of terror prior to the actual uprising, assassinating Jew as well as Roman. They fought among themselves even when Jerusalem was besieged by the Romans, and threatened with death anyone who tried to leave the city. Their cause, noble when put in terms of liberty, was one doomed from the start. Rome was not weak like the Greeks overcome earlier by the Maccabees; Rome was at the height of its military power and not ready to allow a border province to rebel. Ironically Jews in Rome itself lived unmolested during the destruction of Jerusalem.

However, while Jerusalem was being torched and thousands of fighters and civilians alike were being massacred or enslaved in the south, a very different ending was being written in Tsipori. The city, after skirmishes with, among others, Josephus and his army, made peace with the Romans and declined to be drawn into the last stages of the rebellion. It lived on to become the home of Judah ha-Nasi, credited with collecting the Mishnah into its written form, and with strong leadership vis-a-vis the Roman rulers after the failed rebellion of Bar Kochba.

These two stories exemplify two very different, and conflicting, views of the state of our people.

In fact, "Masada shall not fall again", is the cry of modern zealots.

Perceiving Israel and the Jewish people as surrounded by enemies, in a state of siege, they rally their troops, or rather the Israeli army, to perform feats of daring, to sacrifice themselves and their sons and daughters, to preserve the nation and the people. In its early years Israel was a fortress under siege, because it was indeed surrounded by enemies.

But today? Israel's army is overwhelmingly the strongest in the region (and beyond). Like it or not, and many do not, there is no Roman army at the gates. There are people on both sides hostile to peace, but at the same time forces of economic and real-politic are forcing both Israeli and Arab to accept compromise and coexistence.

Some would rather see Jerusalem in flames than make peace between Jew and Palestinian. I would denounce that choice, however, as short-sighted. Are we really willing to retreat to a mountain fastness, isolated and determined to die rather than compromise? After all, Rabbi Yohanan Ben Zakkai left the besieged Jerusalem and founded his rabbinic school in pagan Yavneh.

Can we imagine a Tsipori-like solution to today's impasse? Can we take a chance, believe that our culture and religion is strong enough to withstand outside forces, and that the new Jewish state is strong enough and internally sound enough to flourish in an era of peace?

Perhaps we doubt this possibility. Perhaps we are more comfortable with the old mantra of Masada. But that mantra is no longer a reflection of reality. The legacy of the Zealots was destruction and exile, and a good story. The legacy of the rabbis was a guide to our daily life choices, and to communal survival.

Which one really gave us the resources to live another 2,000 years? The Zealots of Masada or the rabbis of the Talmud?

Multiculturalism a source of pride

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

For many years, I have been a fan of A.M. Rosenthal who writes with verve and vigor for the New York Times. One article by him is called E Pluribus And All That. It deals with immigration and the reaction of the American people towards its continued usefulness, focusing especially on Hispanics.

He writes: "Those who know that immigrations strengthen America and made it, if not always a beacon to the world, at least a lamp, had a lot to be stressed about. A full-blown anti-immigrant campaign, born of mean-minded politics and suckled by sour intellectualism, was nastying up the country."

He continues to congratulate the American people who had the good sense of not listening to the anti-immigrant sentiment and calls it "a combination of virtuous self-interest and good luck.

"Enough Americans decided they did not want to close the doors...[and] cut immigration by 30 percent. That drives anti-immigrants to apoplexy, another good-news bulletin."

So far so good. Rosenthal is right on, and with some changes, his words could be transposed into the Canadian reality.

He then goes on to the related subject of multiculturalism. Rosenthal is not keen on it and feels that Hispanics are making a big mistake in supporting it for reasons they believe are important. To Rosenthal, the American ideal is, "E Pluribus Unum," making one out of many. It is an old image that Americans like to recall: America has become the envy of the world because immigrants want to integrate and be like other Americans. They wanted to emulate the all-American boy or girl living down the street.

Here's where the difference with Canada comes in. We never have spoken of an all-Canadian boy or girl. For Canada is a nation that from the beginning was composed of two quite dissimilar parts, the French and the English, who never would or could agree on a single Canadian idealized image. On the contrary, Canada was distinguished by the fact that here the idea was not to become indistinguishable from your neighbor in an all-Canadian guise, but to be yourself and to contribute to the national welfare without sacrificing your identity and background. Nationalism, it was anticipated, would come by itself.

The result was that Canadian nationalism has been very low key. In fact, that was one of the things that endeared itself to me when I first came, for I detested chauvinism, and it was absent here.

However, while we could stand a little more national pride, it will not be achieved by bashing multiculturalism. Rosenthal feels it is unsuited to the United States and that may be so; but it is very well suited to the character of Canada. Here, we pride ourselves on the fact that although we come from different backgrounds we join together under the umbrella of the nation, living our lives peaceably with one another. In that, we surely can set an example to the world. Multiculturalism has to do with pride of background, and Jews, more than anyone else, should be aware what that means. We contribute to Canada because we are who we are; and so do all who live here.

A voice filled with prophetic outrage

By Shel Krakofsky in London

When I first met Irving Layton at his home in the Notre Dame de Grâce neighborhood of Montreal, he gave me a test. He insisted we both speak Yiddish. Delighted that I could, he engaged me in lighthearted banter and chit chat, obviously pleased and laughing as we were engaged in his earliest language.

Born in Romania as Israel Lazarovitch, he has claimed, "The poet to be was born with the smell of baked challah in his nostrils" — and fully circumcised — a legend he likes to promote as a messianic sign of his destiny. He came to Canada around the age of one and doesn't know the exact day of his birth in 1912.

"I was born sometime in March, but when Stalin croaked on March 12, I claimed that as my birthday in order to link my birth with the death of that hateful tyrant." Some time this month, Irving Layton turned 85.

Nobel-nominated, Governor Generaled, Canada Ordered, he has been controversial as a poet and critic yet universally admired by the legions of students he taught at night school, Herzliah High School and several universities.

"No praise means more to me," he said. "Nothing good that has ever been written about me means more than to be told I was a good teacher."

But it is as a poet that he developed national and international attention as the most public and vocal voice from a nucleus of Montreal poets who, beginning in the 1940s, brought Canadian poetry out of 19th century. Layton blasted energy into archaic and decayed verse forms with a passionate voice filled with the outrage of the Prophets.

He was tormented with injustice and soothed by sexual passion, developing his own judicial version of lex talionis — an eye for a thigh. He courted women and the limelight, his well-publicized marriages and relationships becoming the stuff of tabloid gossip.

Despite growing up in an observant home, as an act of rebellion, he never had a bar mitzvah; nor was he a member of any congregation. His member was his congregation. Layton was celebrating and writing about sex long before sex was invented — during the 1960s as I recall.

Over lunch he boasted, "I know brochos," and recited in Hebrew the blessing over bread. We argued about the nature of the soul. For Layton it is about pleasure, passion, emotion and esthetics. When I mentioned that his version of the soul only dealt with this world, he acknowledged the neshamah, the soul that continues after death.

"I try not to think about it, but I recall when I first comprehended that version of the soul. I was six years old and my mother was cupping her hands over and blessing the Shabbos candles. I distinctly remember thinking of that Jewish flame as something eternal."

He reminisced on that occasion about his good friends David Lewis and A.M. Klein. "They never lost debates to anybody. David would devastate his opponents with a barrage of logic and Abe could pummel his adversaries with brilliant and merciless wit. They were smart enough never to take each other on in public."

He became wistful when he described the relationship between David and Sophie Lewis. "I never knew what love was until I met those two. I still haven't seen the kind of lasting love those two had."

A few years ago, I was part of a reading with Layton. He gave a superb performance, the voice sure, the cadences unmistakable, the emotion true. To enthusiastic applause he left the podium with the brio and walk of a much younger man. He took his seat, turned to me and asked, "Nu, so how did I do?"

"You know what," I told him, "I think you have a future."

"My problem," he replied with a lovely and mischievous smile, "is that I have a past!"

Here's a l'chaim to you our brother Irving. Happy 85th. And in your own words, long may you pole-vault over your grave.

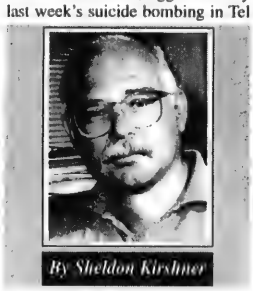
Israel's relations with the Palestinians deteriorate



By Sheldon Kirshner

The current tension besetting Israel's relations with the Palestinians, aggravated by last week's suicide bombing in Tel Aviv, is disquieting but hardly surprising.

Since Israel and the PLO signed the Declaration of Principles in September 1993, barely a month has passed without some kind of a tiff.

But the relationship, never an easy one, has deteriorated since Benjamin Netanyahu's election as prime minister.

When the Labor party was in power, there was certainly no shortage of quarrels between the Israeli government and the Palestinian Authority (PA) over the interpretation of the Oslo accords. But these disputes did not assume crisis proportions, as they have of late.

The main order of business at the outset of the peace process — the phased withdrawal of Israeli forces from parts of the Gaza Strip and from Palestinian towns on the West Bank — was a fairly straightforward affair. Final status issues, ranging from Jerusalem to the drawing of permanent borders, were still far off in the distance.

Both parties, too, were fully behind the Oslo peace process and were reasonably certain of the direction in which it was heading. As well, they had a measure of trust in each other's intentions.

In exchange for peaceful and stable relations with the Palestinians and the rest of the Arab world, Yitzhak Rabin and Shimon Peres were prepared to divest themselves of the moral, political and military burden of the occupation in the territories. To a lesser or greater degree, their objective was separation. And it was implicitly understood that the Palestinians would achieve sovereignty, in the form of an independent though demilitarized state, at the end of the negotiation period.

With the emergence of a Likud government, there was no such road map of what the future held in store. Netanyahu, though promising to proceed with Oslo, was viscerally lukewarm to it and adamantly against a Palestinian state, the Palestinians' overarching goal. And for a while, he refused to meet with Yasser Arafat, the chair of the PLO, the president of the PA, Israel's chief Palestinian interlocutor and a person whom he had demonized.

During the first three months of Netanyahu's administration, Israel and the Palestinians made no discernible progress in reaching an agreement on a partial Israeli redeployment from Hebron.

As a result, Palestinian frustrations intensified. But their grievances transcended Hebron. They felt stifled by the closure of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. The blockade had been imposed by Peres after a wave of Hamas and Islamic Jihad suicide bombings. And the Palestinians continued to accuse Israel of failing to honor Oslo provisions for a "safe passage" route linking the West Bank with Gaza and for the release of Palestinian prisoners. Israel, for its part, cited a litany of Palestinian violations of Oslo.

In late September 1996, following Israel's decision to open a second entrance to the Hasmonean archeological tunnel in East Jerusalem, the West Bank and Gaza exploded in an unprecedented eruption of Palestinian violence, days of rage and gunfire which caused the deaths of 15 Israeli soldiers and 61 Palestinian civilians and policemen. The peace process was threatened, and President Bill Clinton invited Netanyahu, Arafat and King Hussein of Jordan to a summit in Washington. Subsequently, Israel and the PA returned to the negotiating table, presided over by U.S. mediator Dennis Ross. A successful outcome to the talks was initially stymied by a series of seemingly intractable disagreements. Netanyahu and Arafat traded charges that the other side was dragging its feet.

The mounting acrimony was exacerbated by Israel's announcement that special subsidies, frozen by the previous government, would be restored to Jewish settlements beyond the Green Line. But then, in a gesture to the Palestinians, Netanyahu eased the closure.

Finally, in January, Israel and the Palestinian Authority signed the long-delayed Hebron pact. "We have made peace with all the Israeli people," declared Arafat in a rare moment of euphoria. In February, Netanyahu and Arafat had what was called a "constructive" meeting on furthering the peace process. And shortly afterward, Netanyahu released from jail 30 Palestinian women who had been convicted of terrorism.

But Israel and the Palestinians were hardly out of the woods. Netanyahu offended Arafat by reiterating his opposition to a Palestinian state (although Netanyahu's communications advisor seemed receptive to one if certain conditions were met). Arafat irritated Netanyahu by continually delaying the unveiling of a new PLO national covenant (the old one called for Israel's destruction).

Further animosity flared when the Israeli army forced a group of Palestinians to vacate the so-called Yugoslavian Experimental Farm in the Jordan Valley, a tract of land claimed by Israel and the PA.

But the events which triggered the most serious crisis in Israel's mercurial relations with the Palestinians turn on East Jerusalem, annexed by Israel in 1967, and on the package of three planned Israeli withdrawals from the West Bank, due to be completed by the summer of 1998.

Israel's resolve to build the Har Choma neighborhood, together with its intention to close four Palestinian offices in eastern Jerusalem allegedly affiliated with the PA, have galvanized the Palestinians and apparently convinced them that Netanyahu is an untrustworthy partner whose objective is the sabotage of the already-battered peace process.

Under the Olso accords, Israel is free to exercise its claim to Jerusalem. But Israeli facts on the ground prejudice final status talks, which should have begun on March 15 and did not. And, as the United Nations noted in a recent resolution, the 1949 Geneva Convention forbids an occupying power from altering the demographics of the territory it holds.

Having annexed East Jerusalem, which the Palestinians want as their capital, Israel can argue that it is no longer occupied. But neither the Palestinians nor Israel's friends, including Canada and the United States, accept this line of reasoning.

Israel's policy of closing Palestinian institutions in East Jerusalem directly connected with the PA is in keeping with Oslo and with its determination to control the entire city. But are the Palestinian offices in question in fact legally linked with the PA?

The Palestinians' rejection of Israel's offer to evacuate nine percent of the West Bank in the first phase surprised everyone outside Arafat's camp. Arafat, however, expected a much larger slice of territory, particularly in Area C, which, compared to Areas A and B, is exclusively in Israel's hands.

Under Oslo, Israeli redeployments are a function of unilateral Israeli decisions. But the Palestinians are upset with this arrangement, and this bitter dispute is also poisoning the atmosphere.

Last week's suicide bombing, the first in nearly 13 months and the 11th since 1994, is bound to arouse animosities as well. The bomber, who killed himself and three women in a cafe, struck just days after Netanyahu accused Arafat of giving Hamas the indirect "green light" to resume its murderous campaign against civilians in Israel.

Arafat, who condemned the blast, vehemently denied the accusation. But the die has been cast for a war of words between Israel and the Palestinians, if not an outright freeze in the peace process.

"יהודה פוליקר בהופעה חיה בקיסריה" הוא תקליט חדש שימיס לכם את השלג והקרח מבפנים. יש שם את השירים היפים והמוכרים, ולצידם קטעים יווניים סוערים בשני בוזוקי - יהודה מגן עם חברו הטוב (גם הוא ממוצא יווני) חיים רומנו. בשנות השישים הביאו אריס סאן וחבריו את תרבות יוון, אבל היא היתה קשורה תמיד בטקסטים טפשיים וקצת פרחים. עכשיו גדל דור של מוסיקאים שנולדו בישראל להורים יוצאי יוון,-וזה כבר סיפור אחר. זוהי מוסיקה ישראלית עם בוזוקי, באותה מידה של לגיטימיות של שימוש באקורדיאון בשירים רוסיים. שיהיה לכם בכיף.

Quotas rejected

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Canadian government has decided not to impose a quota on the number of refugees admitted to Canada under private sponsorship, even though the idea was proposed by immigration officials.

The decision follows condemnation of the move by refugee activists including York University Prof. Irving Abella, former president of Canadian Jewish Congress.

At a recent book launch for At the Border of Hope by Catholic human rights activist Mary Jo Leddy, Abella criticized those who seek such action: "For too many Canadians, the country is beginning to look the United Nations, and they don't like to see so many brown, yellow and black faces."

Immigration Minister Lucienne Robillard said she opposes a "numerical limitation" on the number of refugees admitted under government and private sponsorship as advocated by her own officials.

"We believe in targets, not quotas," she said.

"There is a hardening of the public heart toward refugees," said York University's Prof. Michael Creal, chair of the book launch at Holy Trinity Church. "The feeling is that refugees aren't really in need of that much help.

Abella described At the Border of Hope, which pleads the cause of refugees, a "momentous book by a remarkable, courageous woman."

"Why are we so hospitable to war criminals and not to their victims?" Abella asked.

"Why are we so deaf to the pleas of these victims?"

He said there are good people in the immigration department working at the Canadian border, and in Canadian embassies around the world, "trying to overcome the system which is totally out of control.

"The truth is difficult to face," he added. "Every opinion poll shows that most Canadians do not want any substantial, increase in immigration. "Canadian policies, reflecting these polls, are "racist and exclusionary."

The book launch was sponsored by Harper Collins Publishers on behalf of the Sanctuary Group and was followed by an interfaith luncheon, most of it cooked by refugees. It featured Eritrean, Sri Lankan, Ethiopian and East Africa dishes.

It also celebrated the publication two years ago of A Call to Conscience arranged by the Sanctuary Group; in it all the major faiths in Canada affirmed their promise to act on behalf of refugees.

Shmuel Adam. Aiming For Success

Shmuel Adam was a leader in the Anti Terrorist Unit of the IDF. On March 11, 1978 he was summoned to fight 11 terrorists who had taken hostage of a bus carrying families on a day trip from Haifa to Jerusalem. The unit moved in, killing most of the terrorists, but in the fight, his arm was severed from his shoulder, his other hand totally crushed. After surgery, he began his rehabilitation at Beit Halochem.

Says Shmuel, 'Whatever I can do with my hand is thanks to the wonderful physiotherapists at Beit Halochem. But they showed me more ... the best rehabilitation was in my head, not in my hand'. To overcome his disability, he began inventing and building specially modified weapons. His injuries did not stop him ... he continued to work for the IDF until 1988, and today he is in charge of security at Israeli Hydro.

Plan to save Branson focuses on ambulatory care

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The proposal to save part of Branson Hospital includes day surgery, an 18-hour urgent care centre with resuscitation equipment, doctors with emergency experience and a walk-in medical clinic.

"Day surgery represents 80 percent of the surgery we do now," said Branson president Jack Gallop. The proposal, which is being made in concert with North York General Hospital, will be made to the hospital commission before April 5.

"It makes sense to use Branson for this purpose," said Gallop.

About one-third to one-half of Branson's present facilities will be kept in use under this proposal, which is being supported by the Metro District Health Council (MTDH).

The council originally recommended that Branson be closed as an acute care centre, but at the same time proposed that the hospital become an ambulatory care centre.

The final decision on Branson will be made by June or July, said Lorne Zon, MTDH executive secretary.

Other possible uses for the building, including palliative care, respite care and senior citizens housing, will be explored at a later date before its closing in 1999, he said.

Branson is not appealing its closing as an acute care facility, in view of its new proposal for an ambulatory care centre, he added.

"There is no way we expect elderly citizens to come across Highway 401 to our place for primary care," said North York General Hospital president Murray Mackenzie. His hospital will support the Branson plan to provide ambulatory care close to the homes of people who need it.

The centre Branson proposes will not be restricted to seniors, Gallop said.

In a related development, Ontario Health Minister Jim Wilson has announced that York Central Hospital in Richmond Hill, which is scheduled to get 10 percent of Branson's patients when it closes, will receive $4.5 million towards a $9-million long-term care facility that includes 60 beds and a seniors' residence.

CJC staffer sees Jews as one big family

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

Jennifer Turack

TORONTO — To Jennifer Turack, director, community services and youth activities for Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, the Ontario Jewish community is just one big family.

For the past year, she has worked with 28 communities outside of the GTA in order to keep them connected and stem a feeling of isolation from other Jews in the province.

Turack, who graduated in Jewish Education and Jewish Studies from Gratz College in Philadelphia and has a certificate in communal work, says that her interest in formal and informal Jewish education as well as her desire to work with people of all ages "makes this the perfect job.

"I run adult classes, Jewish family education, high school programs and family get-togethers in such places as Sault Ste. Marie, Kingston, Windsor and Peterborough. My mandate is to keep Jews involved."

One of her favorite programs was one that linked Thunder Bay and Toronto. "Participants in each city watched a film by Simcha Jacabovitch and were then connected by loudspeaker for the question and answer period. People in outlying areas often read about these events, but obviously cannot attend. This way, they felt part of a community activity. It was a great success."

Programs link various communities

The high school outreach program, she says, is designed to introduce young people to other teens whom they would not normally meet. Students take a correspondence course for three years, meet several times during that time and complete the course with a five-week tour in Israel.

"We've found that students who have been part of the high school program in the past have remained affiliated because they had this positive experience as a youth."

Families also enjoy meeting other Jewish families in their area, says Turack, and often, just by providing them with a list of names, they can contact each other and meet.

"This is a job with a mission. We reach out to all the Jews in Ontario and I really feel that we are helping. I spend a lot of time travelling across the province and people I meet tell me that they appreciate what we are trying to do."

At a recent Oneg Shabbat she ran in Sault Ste. Marie, Turack says that people came from all over to attend.

Sussman elected as JWI president

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

Fern Sussman

TORONTO — If it is up to Fern Sussman, newly installed president of Jewish Women International of Toronto (JWI), her organization's name will be put on the map.

"One of my goals this year is to increase our public awareness. JWI is a service organization and I want everyone in Toronto to know what we do," Sussman said after JWI's recent 45th annual installation of officers.

Fundraising for the B'nai Brith Women Group House in Jerusalem for emotionally disturbed boys ages 13 to 18, as well as for its Children's Home, is a large part of the organization's mandate, says Sussman. But JWI also acts as an advocate on behalf of women on issues such as gun control, breast cancer, the get and domestic violence. JWI funds apartments in Toronto, Montreal and Winnipeg that house battered women and their families.

Among Sussman's goals for her year of office are looking at new ways to increase revenue through fundraising, increasing membership and attracting women to do volunteer work.

"We realize that women today wear many hats and have little time to spare, but I think if we bring excitement and passion to the organization, we will give them a reason to come out. Volunteerism gives people a different feeling in their heart. They have more energy to cope with their own life if they know they are helping others in the community."

Sussman, whose grandfather was a founding member and president of the Ivansker Mutual Benefit Society, says that too many women do not realize the benefits derived from volunteering.

"Her organizational skills are enhanced, her public speaking is improved, she may develop sales skills — these are things that will stay with her for life. [In my more than 20 years with the organization], I learned leadership skills I would otherwise never have experienced. It brings out the best in all of us. Volunteerism works both ways. It improves the person and her community."

President-elect of JWI is Noreen Shelson, vice-presidents are Francine Fogel and Beverley Mandel and treasurer is Lolita Harel. Immediate past president is Barbara Swimmer.

Baycrest Challenge date set

TORONTO — The 17th annual Baycrest Challenge, a charity and road race at the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, returns on Mother's Day, May 11, complete with a number of new events.

Challenge organizers expect close to 2,000 runners will get the racing season off to an early start by entering either the 5K or 10K runs, both 'A' accredited races sanctioned by the Ontario Roadrunners Association.

A new event this year is an officially-timed 10K Wheelchair Division that will provide a venue for serious wheelchair athletes. Recreational wheelers and scooters are invited to participate in the 5K Walk.

Derek Porter, Canada's Olympic silver medalist in rowing at the 1996 summer games in Atlanta, will be on hand to welcome participants at the 5K starting line.

The carnival has a whole new look, thanks to sponsorship from Shoppers Drug Mart. Just Desserts Restaurant and Sporting Life are among the new sponsors who have come on board to provide prizes for the athletes and pledge earners.

Inside those socks, Leonard Chazen, a 10K runner in the 1996 Baycrest Challenge, has his fingers crossed for this years Baycrest Challenge on May 11.

Pre-registration is available at several Bank of Montreal branches and at Sporting Life. For more information, call the Challenge Hotline at 416-256-2RUN.

Benjamin's Park marks its 75th anniversary

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For centuries, it has been traditional for burial societies to have their annual dinner on zayin Adar, the seventh of Adar, the anniversary of both Moses' birth and death.

Benjamin's Park Memorial Chapel is no exception. But this year's dinner had an extra aspect, as it also commemorated the organization's 75th anniversary. Nearly 150 people attended — the chapel's own full and part-time staff, as well as rabbis, cantors, and cemetery and synagogue organization representatives.

The fourth generation of the Benjamin family is now in the business, as represented by Marc and Jordan, who acted as masters of ceremonies for the event. (their father Michael is still at the helm).

All the guests received a commemorative plate, an annual Benjamin's tradition, as well as a medallion, a copy of a Bar Kochba coin inscribed with the words "Freedom for Jerusalem."

Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl, spiritual leader of Beth Tzedec Congregation, said that it is believed that just as the spirit of Moses immediately passed to his successor, Joshua, so too his soul is reborn in the soul of every tzaddik, and every Torah scholar.

He also noted that the Torah says that Moses died with no human support. "But he was not alone — G-d attended him. That is why we honor the chevra kadisha on this day — it signifies that service to the dead is divine.

"This affirms the significance of your work and our commitment to carry on the teachings of Moses and of the Torah that sustained him and sustains us, even beyond the bridge of death."

Rabbi Michael Dolgin, currently assistant rabbi at Temple Sinai, who will assume the post of senior rabbi this summer, said that when Abraham died, "his two sons, Isaac and Ishmael, who previously had not seen eye to eye, buried him together. The Torah recognizes the healing power of religious rituals."

He thanked Michael Benjamin for "allowing the Reform community to take its full part in these rituals, by forming its own chevra kadisha. It is a privilege to live in a community where there is the opportunity to do more mitzvot."

Stephen Speisman, director of the Ontario Jewish Archives, described the Toronto of 1922, when Benjamins was founded, as a community that was establishing itself in the Kensington Market area, and was establishing institutions, such as the Old Folks' Home, Mount Sinai Hospital, the Henry St. shul, the Standard Theatre and the Toronto office of JIAS. While Jews were beginning to enter politics, he said, "you had to be a member of the Orange Lodge to get anywhere [in civic life], and they still rolled up the sidewalks on Sundays."

Rabbi Erwin Schild said that when he started in the Toronto rabbinate 50 years ago, "things were not auspicious. Assimilation was not only rife, but was accepted as inevitable and natural. There was not a single Jewish day school, and kashruth was a subject for quarrels and hostility.

"It was a time of spiritual drought. Benjamins on Spadina Ave. was an oasis of tradition and dignity."

He praised the Benjamin family for "always refusing to give in to the temptation to provide for the lowest common denominator."

Michael Benjamin, who called it a privilege to be "part of the tradition [of chevra kadisha] that goes from father to son, and mother to daughter," said that the chapel "has helped the community live with the truth that all that lives must die. Strength and dignity and beauty are a great resource in dealing with that."

He proposed the formation of a new organization, the Toronto Chevra Kadisha, "to support, nurture and preserve the traditions" of chevra kadisha, to ensure there is adequate cemetery land, and to be involved in education, to ensure the transmission of the laws and customs of chevra kadisha to future generations."

Benjamin called for a series of meetings, newsletters "and future dinners."

"This is our legacy of our 75 years together, and our future for the next 75 years."

Rabbinic Reflections

Nothing beats good old fashioned Torah study

By RABBI AVRAHAM E. PLOTKIN

The times are truly a'changin'. Never before in the history of the world has there been so much information available to us. Never before has this information been so accessible. With a simple push of a button or click of a mouse we are showered with endless sources and Web sites. Entire tomes of knowledge are available to us through the Internet, CD-ROM and fax machines. These are definitely extraordinary times.

Thanks to modern technology, I am never short of an explanation for the parshah of the week, a d'var Torah, a quick sermon or an insight on Rambam. There is simply no shortage. It is all there, waiting for me and prepared on a golden platter.

Yet, despite these amazing developments, and all the good that comes with them, something inside me says that there is something inherently wrong with this new way of life. I can't pinpoint it exactly, but it smells of superficiality. We are spending more time on developing methods of accessing information and sharing information, while very little time is actually spent on digesting and internalizing that information.

At the conclusion of the book of Leviticus, it says: If in my statutes you will walk, on which Rashi comments "Shetiheyu ameilim baTorah," that you must "toil" in the study of Torah. True Torah study is achieved only when toiling and sweating in Torah.

Lately, whenever I point out an obscure Torah interpretation or source to my colleagues, instead of responding as they normally would, they will respond "I have it" or "I don't have it," referring to their computer, of course. Suddenly Torah has become a material possession, like a car or a house, when it should be internalized.

I remember my grandmother telling me when I was a child that after the Communist revolution in Russia, she and her husband, my grandfather, were penniless. Every material possession they had was either left behind or confiscated. My grandmother, understandably, was very distressed. My grandfather, who was a rabbi, seeing her condition, would comfort her by explaining that the enemies of the Jewish people could only confiscate his material possessions, but they could never take away the Torah he had studied. It is with him forever.

I wonder what my grandfather would have said about computers? Just imagine how vulnerable our Torah is today. All it takes is one computer virus and all our Torah knowledge is wiped out. One power shortage without a backup and what are we left with?

I am reminded of the story of the Wizard of Oz. In the story, the so-called wizard would hide behind a facade of fancy machinery and high technology, projecting an image of an immortal wizard with vast powers, until one day, a little dog pulled the curtain and exposed the mortal wizard for what he truly was.

Aren't we all becoming a bit like the Wizard of Oz, hiding behind a facade of computers and Web sites?"

Now, don't get me wrong. I am not discounting the tremendous opportunities that are available to us through the advancement of technology in terms of bringing the message of the Torah to the four corners of the Earth and beyond. But let us not forget that the ultimate purpose of Torah is to become one with it, to be affected by Torah, perfected by Torah and united with Torah.

In Tanya (Ch. 5), the classic book on chassidic philosophy, the difference between Torah study and observance of the mitzvot is explained at great length. Torah study, says the Alter Rebbe, author of Tanya, represents the most amazing unity with HaShem "and there is no other unity like it." This amazing level of unity with HaShem achieved through Torah study doesn't happen by surfin' the Net or cruisin' the information superhighway. It comes only through two words which have recently become taboo and politically incorrect — hard work.

Times may be a 'changin,' but nothing beats some good old-fashioned Torah study.

Rabbi Plotkin is the spiritual leader of Chabad Lubavitch of Markham.

Jewish Life

Life's experiences captured in author's moving poetry

Books

By Bernard Baskin

The Chocolate Coated Years* by Batya Fromm (Sarah Books, $12.95)

The author of this engaging and affecting book of poetry left Winnipeg for Israel 40 years ago. There, on a farming moshav, she raised vegetables, exported hothouse roses, harvested grapes, reared three sons — and also found time to serve as an English teacher and librarian.

The poems deal deftly and gently, among other themes, with the author's experiences as mother and grandmother, the variegated nature of Israeli life, hospital care and routine, and the ever changing miracles of the Israeli landscape and the world of nature.

Made aliyah in 1957

In Alarm, she recalls the Gulf War, "A spasmodic alert:/ metallic waves of warning,/ bray the terrors/ of a renewed assault./ In our shuttered bedroom,/ close and closeted,/ we sit on our big bed/ and tug at the straps/ of our gas masks./ We are twin monsters now,/ under an evil spell,/ caged and sealed in with strips/ of ugly brown cellotape.

The Sagging Sixties is a time of physical deterioration that calls for playful lament. "Sing a song of Sixties,/ a pocket full of pills,/ four and twenty ailments,/ a fever and some chills./ Sing a song of Sixties/ and how the time did fly,/ "Golden Age' they call this?/ I never shall know why/ ...Sing a song of Sixties,/ you've managed to survive./ Try pinching your posterior/ to see if you're alive.

Ruanda on my Veranda mockingly asks, "Why do they keep bothering me/ about Ruanda?/ Why can't someone enjoy his food/ in peace and quiet/ without having to look at/ those emaciated bodies,/ day in and day out?./ It's enough to spoil/ a person's appetite.

Kashrut on the Internet

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Of all the traditions that have shaped the essence of being a Jew, few have had the impact of kashrut. So it's not surprising that the Jewish Highway is paved with articles that both try to explain the rationale behind this fundamental mitzvah and give practical guidance for its observance. Today I am going to take a look at general resources about kashrut on the Internet. (In my next column, I will focus specifically on food and Passover.)

Why keep kosher? That daunting question is addressed by several articulate writers. At the Orthodox Union (O-U) site [http://www.ou.org/torah/kosher.html] Rabbi Joseph Grunblatt poses the central question "Do you really think G-d cares what we eat?" His answer: "The G-d of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob does care about every individual...He is 'our Father in Heaven.' A father cares about the moral and spiritual development of his child but also takes care that the child is properly fed."

Dennis Prager has also written thought-provoking articles entitled Should a Modern Jew Keep Kosher? at [gopher://shamash.org:70/11/places/boston/bakol/kosher/]. Also see Judaism and the Art of Eating [http://linex.com/~yrice/kosher.html].

If you want to share your current level of observance, you can participate in the kashrut survey at [http://www.jcn18.com/Jewishfood/Koshpoll.htm]. You can check off anything from "I think keeping kosher is negative" to "I keep kosher at home, but will eat anything in any restaurant" to "I trust no one else's Kashrut and eat only at home."

Deciding to keep kosher can be a challenge. In her thoughtful article "Easing into Kashrus," [http://www.kashrus.org/kosher/easing.html] Leah Lederman explains how her family started keeping kosher and details their step-by-step approach to this very important decision.

For a general overview of some of the frequently asked questions about kashrut, take a look at [http://shamash.org/lists/scj-faq/HTML/faq/06-index.html]. But if you really want to understand the nitty gritty of observing kashrut, then check out Steven Weintraub's Kashrut Class Lecture [http://www.pswtech.com/~stevenw/jewish/kosher/all.html]. Weintraub goes into detail about the laws of blood and slaughter and how to kasher utensils. He also explains different observances among Jews in such area as the use of grape products, rennet, gelatin, Chalav Yisrael and fish.

Speaking of fish, if you ever tire of lox, why not help yourself to a nice piece of Arctic char, mahimahis, mutton hamlet or would you believe porkfish? Don't worry, they're all kosher [http://www.kashrus.org/kosher/fish.html]. But I would stay away from those treif lomosuckers, lampreys and ratfishes.

Anyone who has ever strained their eyes trying to decipher the strange symbols or "hechshers" attesting to the kashrut of a product will be thankful for the listing of Reliable Kosher Supervision [http://www.kashrus.org/kosher/symbol.html] provided by Rabbi E. Eidlitz, author of Is it Kosher? You'll find fifty kashrut symbols from Canada, England, France, Israel and the United States.

Some of those supervisory organizations maintain their own Websites. The Kashrut Council of Toronto [http://www.feduja.org/rellife/kashintr.stm] has reprinted its entire kashrut directory on line. Also see the Orthodox Union [http://www.ou.org/kosher/index.html], Kof-K Kosher Supervision [http://www.kof-k.com/root.htm] and the Kosher Overseers of America [http://kosher.org/]. Sometimes a product mistakenly carries a kosher symbol. At its interesting site, Kashrut.Com [http://www.kashrut.com] lists products with erroneous certification.

Just because a food is kosher doesn't mean it's good for you. There's a lot of junk out there with the finest kashrut supervision. In Ritually and Naturally Pure [http://www.jcn18.com/Jewishfood/silver_1.htm] Chayyim Pesach Silverman addresses this phenomenon and explains why he has chosen a Kosher/Organic lifestyle.

If you are still looking for more Kashrut links, you can find them at the Jewish Identity's Link Launcher [http://ucsu.colorado.edu/~jsu/identity.html#kosher], the Jewish Communication Network's Food Section [http://www.jcn18.com/Jewishfood/] and at Maven [http://www.maven.co.il/subjects/idx120.htm].

Although the Jewish Highway is jammed with information about Kashrut, I must stress that you should always consult your own rabbi when you have specific questions. But it's good to know that in a pinch, you can always e-mail your kosher query to, who else, the Webbe Rebbe [http://www.empirekosher.com/rabbi.htm].

Spielberg's Holocaust Foundation CEO seeking survivors' testimonies

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The new president and CEO of Steven Spielberg's Survivors of the Shoah Visual History Foundation is appealing to Holocaust survivors across Canada to come forward and have their testimonies filmed for posterity.

Michael Berenbaum says he won't be satisfied until the last survivor in Canada tells his or her story before a camera.

In the past, officials with the Los Angeles-based foundation have expressed disappointment with Canadian response to Spielberg's plan to record the testimonies of Holocaust survivors the world over.

The 1991 census found just over 27,000 survivors in Canada, with 12,600 in Toronto. An estimated 8,300 live in Montreal.

To date, the number of people who have been taped is: Toronto, almost 2,000; Montreal, about 250; Winnipeg, 100; Vancouver, 50; Ottawa, 40; and fewer than a dozen in Atlantic Canada.

Worldwide, over 28,000 survivors have been interviewed since 1994 and the project is continuing to see about 400 people a week. Interviews have been conducted in 37 countries and 27 languages.

"We're in a race against time," says Berenbaum, who was hired to head the foundation after spending nearly 20 years at the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, where he served as project director and then as director of the research institute. "We want testimony before it's too late."

'We're in a race against time'

Last month, the project got a big boost thanks to the television broadcast of Spielberg's Schindler's List. Over 65 million people watched the film and the foundation was flooded with 4,000 calls that night and over 10,000 in the following days.

A Toronto office of the foundation opened in late 1994 and filming in Montreal got underway last year. Over 100 people have been trained as interviewers in Canada.

But "we're not satisfied with the number of Canadians who have come forward," Berenbaum said in an interview. "That's why we've extended the [Canadian] office's lease on life."

Interviews typically last about two hours. Spouses, children and grandchildren are encouraged to appear toward the end of the session.

"Every interview takes on its own character," Berenbaum says. "Some are breathtaking and some are frustrating. We have not had an interview from which we have not learned something."

The Survivors of the Shoah Visual History Project began after Spielberg's 1994 Oscar-night pledge not to allow the Holocaust to become a historical footnote.

State-of-the-art cameras and sound equipment are used. The finished product is then sent to Los Angeles, where the tape is digitized and cross-referenced using key words and geographic place names, in order to allow researchers to access information using almost any variable.

Organizers want the project to become one of the world's foremost databases on the Holocaust.

Each survivor receives a VHS copy of the interview. Finished segments are also forwarded to five repositories: Yad Vashem in Jerusalem; the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington; the Simon Wiesenthal Centre in Los Angeles; the Fortunoff Video Archive at Yale University; and the Museum of Jewish Heritage in New York.

Berenbaum said that the Canadian War Museum in Ottawa, which is planning a wing dedicated to the Holocaust, has requested copies of interviews with Canadians.

"Our task is designed to tell survivors that they have the opportunity to bequeath to us, to history, to the world, their experience," Berenbaum says.For more information from anywhere in Canada, dial, toll free, 1-800-388-8045.

Jews must stand up for their rights

'A murderer does not profit'

of which he is also president, have embarked on a historic process designed to bring a measure of closure to the Holocaust.

"It's a moral and a financial issue," declared Bronfman, the chairman of the multi-billion dollar Seagram Company Limited. "There's a fundamental philosophy in Judaism that the murderer does not profit and inherit."

Bronfman's strategy has already paid dividends. Negotiations with more than a dozen European countries are well under way. Three major Swiss banks and several Swiss insurance companies have established a special $200 million (US) fund to alleviate the financial needs of Holocaust survivors. Pending approval by parliament and a nation-wide referendum, the Swiss government has promised to set up a $4.7 billion (US) fund to help the victims of the Holocaust and of poverty and of human rights violations.

But in Bronfman's view, much more remains to be done.

- What happened to the Swiss bank deposits of Jews who perished in the Holocaust? By all accounts, Swiss bankers may be sitting on upwards of $7 billion (US).
- To what extent did Swiss industry help Nazi Germany and thus prolong World War II? "We know Switzerland was very helpful in selling war material to Germany," he said, citing a U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff report to the State Department.

"How much blood is on Swiss hands? This has to be found out." Bronfman hopes that two fact-finding Swiss commissions will answer these and other questions.

Bronfman said that current talks between the World Jewish Restitution Organization and European countries such as Holland, Poland and France should take about five years to complete.

"Hopefully, as in the case of Switzerland, we won't have to use threats." (Hearing this, Bronfman's aide, Elan Steinberg, intervened, advising that the word "persuasion" should be substituted for "threats.")

Turning to another topic, Bronfman said that he is "satisfied" that Swedish diplomat Raoul Wallenberg, who saved thousands of Hungarian Jews during the war and fell into Soviet hands in 1945, is in fact dead.

Informed that Canadian researcher David Matas has not received Russian cooperation in his effort to solve the mystery of Wallenberg's disappearance, Steinberg — the executive director of the World Jewish Congress — said: "We won't close the book [on Wallenberg] until we have proof he died."

May never know truth about Argentina bombing

Bronfman said Argentina is no closer today than it was a few years ago in apprehending the masterminds of the bombings that wrecked the Israeli embassy and the Jewish community centre in Buenos Aires in 1992 and 1994.

"The trail is very cold and we may not find the truth. There may be a coverup but not necessarily by the government." Bronfman said that Argentina's president, Carlos Saul Menem, "is serious about getting to the bottom of it."

Bronfman's theory is that the bombings were a protest over the improvement of Argentina's relationship with Israel. He said he does not know whether they were perpetrated by non-Argentinian Arabs or by local Argentinians.

According to Bronfman, Jean Marie Le Pen, the leader of the radical right-wing National party, poses a clear and present danger to France's Jewish community, though he does not believe he will be elected president in the next election.

Le Pen, he noted, is not only personally xenophobic and anti-Jewish, but exploits anti-Semitism for political purposes.

Canada, he said, is not unique in having compiled a less than admirable record in ferreting out and bringing to justice war criminals.

"It's a very difficult question. Is there a statute of limitations on this evil? I don't know. It would have been better if Canada had acted after the war. It's easy to say that Canada is no good and hasn't pursued these people. "

Bronfman acknowledged that he labors under "philosophical confusion" in deciding whether war criminals in Canada should be called to account or be left alone.

Germany, he observed, has acted credibly in trying to expose its postwar population to the Holocaust era. However, Jews still have monetary claims against Germany. "It's very important not to let the Germans off the hook."

Asked to comment on Benjamin Netanyahu's policies, Bronfman, a Labor party supporter, complimented the Israeli prime minister for having convinced three-quarters of Israel's population to back the Oslo peace accords. "It's a great achievement," he said, taking note of Netanyahu's far-right constituency.

As for the Palestinians' rejection of the first of three planned Israeli redeployments from the West Bank, Bronfman said Israel should not have negotiated the matter with the Palestine Authority, and would have been better off had it presented "the world with a fait accompli."

Canadian, Russian academics meet at program

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When Michael Brown visited Russia in 1984, the thought of returning to participate in a conference on Jewish Studies, as he did this year, would have been ludicrous.

"If you had imagined it then, you would have had to be a bit off the wall," concedes Brown, director of York University's Centre for Jewish Studies.

Brown and Bernie Zelechow, a humanities professor and York's international project coordinator for its Centre for Jewish Studies and its division of humanities, were among some 300 academics and graduate students to attend this year's Sefer conference held at Moscow's Academy of Sciences. The majority were Russian, with a sprinkling of North Americans and Israelis.

Brown and Zelechow, who sit on Sefer's international advisory board, were the only Canadians.

Sefer was organized six years ago in Russia to address the dissemination of Jewish learning in the former Soviet Union.

The recent conference, Sefer's fourth, enabled international academics to share non-authoritarian teaching approaches with their Russian counterparts, said Zelechow.

Michael Brown

An academic exchange program between York's Centre for Jewish Studies and the history department at Rostov Pedagogical University in Rostov-on-Don in southern Russia was an outgrowth of last year's conference. Brown and Prof. Oleg Budnitskii of the Russian university were instrumental in setting it up.

Although Jewish studies per se does not exist in Rostov (there are, however, programs at Moscow and Leningrad universities), Budnitskii is trying very hard to bring Jewish content into Russian history courses, said Zelechow.

"I think his work has been heroic because he faces tremendous ambivalence if not overt anti-Semitism," added Zelechow, who travelled to Rostov with his colleague Martin Lockshin to inaugurate the program last year.

Both professors lectured in Rostov, Lockshin at the local synagogue, which Zelechow said was "well maintained and functioning."

The Canadians encountered no overt anti-Semitism, but met with profound ignorance about Judaism. "As a Jew and doing Jewish things, I felt I had to continually justify myself. People asked me, 'Why do you want to do this?'"

Federal government funding made possible both trips and was recently confirmed for a May lecture visit by Brown and Prof. Maynard Maidman. Budnitskii is to lecture at York next week.

Brown is optimistic about the future of Jewish studies in Russia. "They're operating without resources, [but] if they have people who are dedicated, hard-working and talented, they'll get it up and running in spite of the obstacles."

Two pilot projects are in the works at York to help them. One involves simultaneous classes — one in Moscow, one at York — that would be linked by computer modem. The experimental set-up is still being investigated. Pending adequate funding and technology, it will also be used at Rostov and other provincial universities.

The second project involves making Judaic material available on CD-ROM for Russian campuses.

The York academics also hope to share their expertise in Jewish teacher training.

Steps have been taken toward facilitating a student exchange. The first student to participate (albeit not yet as part of a formal exchange program) is Budnitskii's son, Eugene Budnitsky, 18, who arrived here in January, having studied economics and English since 1995 at two universities in Rostov.

Here, he is studying economics, anthropology and humanities. He hopes to stay on to study Hebrew and possibly other Jewish studies courses next year.

As the first person in his family to go abroad (he spent two weeks as an exchange student in Britain at the age of 13, and a year in Vermilion, Ohio, in high school), Budnitsky has long dreamed of studying at a western university.

For a Canadian student to study in Rostov, facility in Russian would be important, noted Budnitsky.

"I think that would be the major barrier. I believe people are pretty much the same wherever they are."

New campus guide a useful resource

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Students applying to university might want to consult the updated Princeton Review Hillel Guide to Jewish Life on Campus. The 1997 edition, like earlier ones, has contact names, addresses and phone numbers for Jewish student groups, information about kosher food, services and Jewish studies programs.

While the majority of universities listed are North American, campuses in Israel, Europe, Japan and other locales are also included.

Although the book is a useful resource, be aware that some of the information is outdated or incomplete — Toronto's Ryerson Polytechnic University, with an estimated 1,200 Jewish students, is not even listed, nor are most of the over 30 British Hillels.

To find out about unlisted Canadian universities, more information may be obtained by contacting your nearest campus liaison representative:

Rabbi Ken Kaufman, executive director, Hillel Vancouver 604-224-4748; Tom Rado, western region campus services coordinator, 306-343-7023; Jennifer Turack, director of community services and youth activities, Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, 416-635-2883; Steve Spodek, acting executive director, Hillel of Montreal, 514-845-9171; or Yakov Feig, campus liaison, Atlantic Provinces Jewish Students' Federation, 902-422-7491.

Yiddish program gets $45,000 donation

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — An anonymous donor has given $45,000 to keep the Yiddish Studies program at the University of Toronto going until 1998, providing the contribution is matched dollar for dollar by the public.

"Miracles do happen in Jewish life and this is one of them," said program supporter Bayla Chaikof. "Until a few days ago, we were very concerned that the program would shut down."

She gave the good news at a Leah Posluns Theatre gala presenting Reflections of a Golden Peacock, a one-man show by New York actor Avi Hoffman. Based on the life of famed Yiddish poet Itsik Manger, it was written by his mother, Miriam, a Yiddish teacher at Columbia University. His piano accompanist was Barry Alyn.

The U of T program enables many students to understand their Jewish roots and deals positively with the issue of Jewish continuity, Chaikof said.

The late Polish-born Manger led a complicated life (What Jewish poet doesn't? Manger himself would ask) and the Hoffmans faced a formidable task in recreating it dramatically.

The show had its ups and downs. It was most successful when, in commenting on the Holocaust, Manger asked God why he, a poet, was "left to wander among the remnants of my people?"

This reviewer was disappointed that nearly all the dialogue between Yiddish songs was in English. "I come to you as I am, a loser, a boozer," he says in a summing up of his hard life. How thrilling those words would have sounded in Yiddish!

It may be that Hoffman misread the audience's understanding of Yiddish (it is higher than in most U.S. cities), for he did the show in Montreal entirely in Yiddish. Those in the gala audience not familiar with Yiddish were delighted with his approach.

Consummate actor that he is, Hoffman mined the humor in Manger's work well, from King Achashverosh of the Megillah story standing in his gotkes (underwear), to the crushing disillusionment when his new bride, Malkele, takes off her golden curls to reveal a shaven head.

Manger did eventually get to the real Jerusalem. The play tells the story of his meeting a beautiful uniformed Israeli airwoman in Tel Aviv, a woman he had once seen on a Polish train wearing a cross. It was his humming of Oyfn Veg Shteyt a Boym (one of his most famous songs) that invoked her Jewish identity and led her to Israel.

Semi-formal held at McMaster U

By TRACY PILARSKI and SARA PRICE

HAMILTON — The McMaster Jewish Student's Association (JSA) recently hosted their annual semi-formal at the Jewish Community Centre (JCC) in Ancaster.

Some 80 Jewish students came from universities in Toronto, London, Guelph, Waterloo and Kitchener to dance to the music provided by the DJ.

The McMaster JSA executive decorated the Hamilton JCC and prepared the food. The desserts were made by local caterer Susan Walman.

Throughout the year, the JSA at MAC holds educational programs, Shabbat dinners, holiday celebrations and social programs.

YORK STUDENTS IN ISRAEL

Seen above are some of the York University students currently studying in Israel at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, Tel Aviv University, and the Arava Institute for Environmental Studies. Professor Martin Lockshin, from York's Centre for Jewish Studies, met with the students on a recent trip to Israel to hear about their experiences and to bring them up-to-date on developments at home. Students seen above are: Vanessa Ohayon, Limor Braunstein, Alyssa Schwartz, Adina Lubek, Evan Buntman, Lori Shapero, Michelle Bossin, Perlita Ettudgui, Michelle Boles, Samantha Greisman and Daniella Kiguel. Jewish victimization under Stalin remembered

By BARUCH COHEN

The files of the Stalinist era have not only disclosed a secret history of heroism and despair, they have also laid bare the inner lives of the literary informers who brought Isaac Babel, Osip Mandelstam, Boris Pasternak, Peretz Markish and many other great Jewish writers to their ruin.

Zakhor, the biblical command to remember, "has been a vital imperative for the Jewish people and one of the keys to its survival," writes Prof. Yosef Hayim Yerushalmi in his book Zakhor: Jewish History and Jewish Memory (1982).

The following is in memory of the Jewish victims of communism, the Soviet-style communism that affected Jews no less than its fascist counterpart (though it claimed fewer Jewish lives), deeply damaging the spirit of Jewry.

Works written by Nadezhda Mandelstam (Hope Against Hope and Hope Abandoned), Eugenia Ginzburg, Andrey Sinyavsky and Joseph Brodsky undermined the entire moral legitimacy of the Soviet regime. Memoirs like The Long Return by Esther Markish (wife of the poet Peretz Markish) and most recently, in 1990, Louis Rapoport's Stalin's War Against the Jews, The Doctor's Plot and the Soviet Solution shed light on the tragedy of Jewish artists, writers and poets and on the entire Jewish intelligentsia.

Jewish members of the Soviet Communist party like Lazar Kaganovitch, (Kaganovitch was considered a remarkable administrator and soon became known as the "Iron Commissar") accumulated increasing power. In Nikita Khruschev's estimation, "Kaganovitch had always been 'a detestable sycophant,' exposing enemies and having people arrested right and left."

Kaganovitch and Joseph Stalin both shared a deep-rooted hatred for intellectuals. Many of those so doomed had Jewish names. Kaganovitch particularly despised the educated Jews of his native Ukraine (after the abolition of czarist-era quotas, Jews constituted half the university students). In his zealous pursuit of the "people's enemies," Kaganovitch would be second only to the successive chiefs of the secret police during the terror years: Yagoda, N. Yezhov and Beria.

In the spirit of the 1939 Stalin-Hitler pact, all Soviet organs deliberately remained silent about the periodical slaughtering of the Jews by the National Congress of Poland. Jewish victims of mass execution were called "Poles" or "Ukrainians" in the Soviet press and radio reports. As Soviet historian Roy Medvedev wrote: "not once... was one lesson or one lecture devoted to anti-Semitism, its role in Nazi policy, or the Nazi murder of almost the entire Jewish population of Europe." Stalin, in step with the times, had destroyed what was left of organized Soviet Jewish life.

Many Jewish artists and writers accepted the need to serve the Soviet state during the war years. Their sad final fate is well known: Solomon Mikhoels, the creator of the Moscow Jewish Theatre where Marc Chagall had painted sets and murals; Peretz Markish, a brilliant poet; Itzhak Solomonovitch Feffer, the Yiddish poet." Mikhoels, Feffer, Markish and many other eminent Jewish intellectuals, members of the Anti-Fascist Committee sent to the United States during World War II for propaganda reasons, were all executed by Stalin.

The many great Soviet artists who lived in Stalin's shadow could never explain why he spared some of them: Ilya Ehrenburg, Boris Pasternak and Sergei Eisenstein, yet destroyed many others: Isaac Babel, Meyerhold Vsevolod Emilievitch, Mandelstam, Mikhoels, Markish, Pilniak, and Der Nister (Pinches Kahanovich) — all of them Jews.

The tragic story of Mikhoels, the king of the Jewish State Theatre, encapsulates the epic tragedy of Soviet Jewish artists, writers and intellectuals. Well-known writers and artists could vanish at any time, for no comprehensible reason.

Babel, a gentle man who wore very thick spectacles that magnified a pair of sad eyes, was generally regarded as one of the greatest Russian writers of all times. Babel, who insisted on writing about Jewish life, was far too individualistic to survive in Soviet society.

Feffer, a very active member of the Communist party, made his debut as a Yiddish poet in 1920 and shortly thereafter became prominent in Soviet-Yiddish literature. He harnessed himself to the party line and the majority of his poems are propaganda for the Communist party. Feffer "drank happiness from Stalin's Cup," a famous stanza in one of his well-known poems Stalin. He also wrote Ich bin a Yid (I am a Jew) during World War II when the party permitted such poems. His poem Shadow of the Warsaw Ghetto (Shotens Von Varshauer Geto) is a valuable contribution to the literature of the Holocaust.

However, as Esther Marakish tells us in her memoir The Long Return, Feffer was behind the arrest of Mikhoels and others from the Anti-Fascist Committee.

Tragically, the files of the Stalinist era tell us about the Machiavellian maneuvering in which Jewish literary personae became agents and informers against their Jewish comrades.

The well-known story of The Doctor's Plot, brilliantly told by Louis Rapoport, describes the evil plan arranged by Stalin and his collaborators after 1951, which could have contributed to a "final solution," a total destruction of Soviet Jewry.

Communism appealed to many intellectuals. Jewish artists, writers and scholars rose to the second highest positions in the Communist state after the ruling elite; and intellectuals were interested in assuming state power themselves. Certainly, many Jews believed that they saw a correspondence between the prophetic ideals of compassion and justice in their own tradition and the incorporation of those ideals into a political system. Jews who lent communism their moral support are neither to be solely blamed for, nor are they entirely innocent of, the human catastrophe it brought about.

In the early 1950s, anti-Semitic hysteria swept through Communist Russia — and indeed the entire Eastern European Communist bloc — with attacks on Jews printed in all the newspapers. In 1952, Stalin's political line was to purge the Jewish element from Soviet society. The show-trials of the 1950s unmasked disloyal Trotskyite "internationalists" (a synonym for Jews), and the ensuing purges eliminated Jews from elite circles. During World War II, three million Jews were abandoned to the Nazis, and after the war, an officially sanctioned campaign of persecution and murder against "rootless cosmopolitans" cleared Jews out of the higher professions and decimated the Russian cultural world.

We must never forget the terrible Jewish toll taken by Soviet and East-European communism. The tragedy of this page in Jewish history is that so many Jewish intellectuals were attracted to communism, and once caught in its web, some became tools and tragic executors of their own people.

Kolel plans Hebrew study day

TORONTO — On April 13, hundreds of people across Canada will learn to read Hebrew in just eight hours.

Scheduled in honor of Yom Ha'atzmaut — Israel Independence Day — National Hebrew Literacy Day costs $49 (Israel's age) and includes a light lunch, textbook and all materials. Classes are offered in six locations in the Greater Toronto Area, including downtown, North York, Thornhill and Hamilton.

Last year, over 400 people across Canada took the course. Offered this year, are two levels: absolute beginner for those who have never studied Hebrew and refresher for those who have either studied Hebrew but forgotten much of what they learned or know the basic Aleph Bet and would like to improve their reading.

Sponsored by Kolel: A Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning and ARZA Canada, the Association of Reform Zionists of Canada, the course is open to anyone with a desire to learn Hebrew.

For more information, call Shirley Herman, special projects coordinator, National Hebrew Literacy Day, at 905-764-1329 or fax 905-709-1895.

Supreme Court to hear constitutional challenge

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The Supreme Court of Canada will hear Robert Libman's constitutional challenge of the Quebec referendum law April 22. A final judgment on this case, launched five years ago, could have a major impact on how the next sovereignty referendum is organized.

Libman's lawyer Julius Grey will argue that the law violates the freedoms of expression and association because it forces anyone who wishes to participate in a referendum campaign, in any way that involves the expenditure of money, to receive approval from either the official Yes or No committees, which are headed, respectively, by the leaders of the Parti Québécois (PQ) and the Liberal party.

The objective of the law, adopted in 1978, is to ensure that overall spending limits are not exceeded.

This partisan approach can put at a disadvantage those individuals or groups that, for example, support the Yes side, but may have different reasons than those of the Liberals, Libman said. The political bedfellows can be even stranger when the referendum is not about sovereignty, as Libman found out in 1992.

Libman heads to court

It was the prospect of being in the same camp as the PQ and Jacques Parizeau in the national referendum on the Charlottetown constitutional accord that led Libman, then leader of the Equality party, to contest the law.

The party initially opposed Charlottetown because it felt it did not provide adequate protection of minority rights in Quebec. The PQ, which led the No committee, was against the accord for precisely the opposite reason – it did not give Quebec enough powers.

Nevertheless, the law required the Equality party to register with the No committee and receive approval for any activity favoring the No side that required direct or indirect funding.

"If we had wanted to rent a hall to hold a rally or publish an ad, we, in effect, needed the support of the PQ, even if we were spending our own money," Libman said.

The scenario never happened, however, because Equality changed its position and supported Charlottetown. But Libman said he was not much more comfortable in the camp of Liberal leader Robert Bourassa, whose nationalist arguments for the accord were not consistent with Equality's pro-Canada stance.

Libman's legal argument is that the rights of individuals outside the two main parties are infringed because the official Yes and No committees have the power to prohibit spending on campaign activities whose message does not coincide with their own.

Libman, now regional B'nai Brith Canada (BBC) director, said if he wins the case, the Quebec government could either amend the law to find some other way of controlling third-party spending or invoke the notwithstanding clause and ignore the high court.

Russians stonewall on Wallenberg

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — More than 50 years after the disappearance of Swedish war hero Raoul Wallenberg into Soviet "protective custody," Moscow is still stonewalling inquiries into his fate, says a Canadian researcher recently returned from a fact-finding mission.

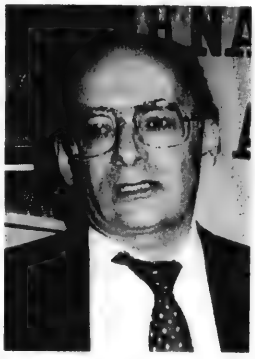
Winnipeg human rights lawyer David Matas says many officials in Russia still go to great lengths to block queries into the plight of Wallenberg, who is credited with having rescued as many as 100,000 Hungarian Jews from the Holocaust.

Last September, Matas received a $5,000 grant from Foreign Affairs Minister Lloyd Axworthy, enabling him to travel to Russia, Sweden, London, Riga and Washington to probe the fate of Wallenberg, one of the lasting mysteries of World War II.

The scion of a wealthy banking family, Wallenberg was dispatched from Sweden to Budapest by the U.S. War Refugee Board in 1944 to try and save as many Jews as possible from Nazi deportations. In the frantic months ahead, he issued up to 50,000 fake Swedish passports and spirited their bearers to safe house that flew the neutral Swedish flag.

Near the end of the war, he persuaded the Nazis to call off the razing of Budapest's Jewish ghetto with its 50,000 inhabitants.

Wallenberg was arrested by the invading Soviets in 1945 as an American spy. Beginning in 1957 and continuing to this day, Moscow has maintained that he died of a heart attack in prison in 1947, despite any supporting evidence and plenty of evidence to the contrary. There have also been at least a dozen credible witnesses who claimed to have had contact with



David Matas

Wallenberg in prison through the 1950s and '60s, and as late as 1989.

Wallenberg was made Canada's only honorary citizen in 1985.

Matas had been involved with the international 1990 team that probed Wallenberg's fate and whereabouts. The 10-member commission, which was headed by McGill University Prof. Irwin Cotler, hoped, ideally, to find a "smoking gun" — something that would finally reveal what became of Wallenberg.

Not only did Cotler not find his grail, he encountered what he called a massive coverup of the Wallenberg file by the KGB and an impenetrable wall of bureaucratic silence.

Matas calls his mission an "outgrowth" of Cotler's commission, and its outcome is chillingly similar: "In Russia, the Wallenberg case is a secret within a secret," Matas told The CJN. "A tremendous amount of effort has gone into covering it up."

Matas spent a week in Moscow poring over documents and trying to interview Russian officials. "Everybody who has ever had contact with the case has been intimidated into silence," he says. "We encountered bureaucratic roadblocks everywhere, especially at the lower levels, where secrecy is a carry-over from the old Soviet days."

Some files on Wallenberg were released in 1991, but Matas says the doors closed again soon after. For example, at Vladimir prison outside Moscow, where Wallenberg had been held, officials allowed members of a Swedish group to examine records but not to photocopy them.

Similar other attempts were also stymied, Matas says, because the Russians continue to keep prison files on Wallenberg at the old KGB archives, where the public has no access to them.

Two separate commissions continue to probe Wallenberg's fate: a Swedish working group headed by Sweden's ambassador to Latvia, and a Russian working group. Matas was able to secure interviews with every member of the Swedish group, but none with the Russian, which he says has done little else but throw up obstacles.

Matas now believes that the 1957 memo signed by Russia's then foreign minister Andrei Gromyko, declaring that Wallenberg had died of a heart attack a decade earlier, is "a total fabrication." He fears that a 1947 "liquidation" order against Wallenberg could mean the Swede was murdered and all traces of the crime removed.

Matas' frustration was not limited to Russia. In Washington, he found CIA documents with Wallenberg's name, but the relevant parts were blacked out.

In London, he unearthed listings of files on Wallenberg for 1946 and 1947, but the files themselves were missing.

Raoul Wallenberg

Matas hopes to release his report in May, after the two working groups release their findings.

Special to The CJN

VANCOUVER — In honor of its 25th anniversary, the Jewish Historical Society of British Columbia sponsored an exhibit called Creating Community, chronicling the history of Jewish life in Vancouver.

With photographs, text and a short video presentation, the exhibit traces the various stages of development and different characteristics of the city's Jewish community.

The 13-minute video presentation, More than Gold, provides an introduction to Jewish life in Vancouver. The photographs with accompanying text then portray the changes in the Vancouver Jewish community over the years.

Particularly striking is the section of the exhibit which focuses on the various neighborhoods where Jews have resided in since first settling in Vancouver some 125 years ago.

According to exhibit chair Carol Fader, after its showing in Vancouver, the exhibit will be available to other Jewish communities across the country to enable them to learn about the history of Jewish life in Canada's third largest Jewish community.

'Distinct' status pushed

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Canadian Intergovernmental Affairs Minister Stéphane Dion called on the Jewish community to help "explain to other Canadians" why Canada should recognize Quebec as distinct.

It should do so, Dion said, because the Jewish community knows the value of having several cherished identities: as Jews, Montrealers, Quebecers and Canadians.

"You don't want to choose between them," Dion said while delivering the luncheon speech to an all-day conference organized by Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region's (CJC-Q) young leadership committee (YLC) at the Queen Elizabeth Hotel.

"In Quebec, you have learned to live in harmony with the French community that is a tiny minority on this anglophone continent.

"You know how much you share with francophone Quebecers. But you must also say that to other Canadians."

During his speech before a receptive crowd of about 200, Dion delivered an ardent if by-now oft-stated argument for renewed federalism and a united Canada, singing its praises as more tolerant and open to minorities than other countries (including, he stressed, in Quebec) and noting that the conference theme of Unity in Diversity succinctly captured the essence of Canada's greatness.

Dion alluded dismissively to comments made by Quebec Premier Lucien Bouchard about Canada not being a "true country" and said Canadians should not be "embarrassed" by their ethnic or cultural differences because they have worked to build a humane country of universal values that's the envy of the world.

On the issue of Quebec seceding, Dion said such an act would be illegal and would not be recognized under international or Canadian law.

In pointing to statistics that put Quebec on par with the rest of Canada in terms of its tolerance towards minority groups, Dion referred to the recent annual B'nai Brith audit that showed fewer anti-Semitic incidents in Quebec.

And despite ongoing stories about anti-Semitism within Quebec clerical and nationalist circles 50 years ago, Dion pointed to historic antecedents showing a "shared" history between Jews and French-Canadians.

CONTROVERSIAL PROPOSAL AIRED

U.S. private investigator Steven Rambam (right) joined Prof. Irving Abella, chair of Canadian Jewish Congress' war crimes committee, in Ottawa last week to mark the 10th anniversary of the Deschenes Report on Nazi war criminals. They unveiled a new approach to bringing war criminals to justice by offering the chance of immunity for lesser criminals in exchange for evidence against more serious perpetrators.The United States has successfully "turned" war criminals against their former comrades and Congress would urge federal authorities to offer immunity for information that could be used against more serious offenders, Abella said. The proposal came under fire from B'nai Brith Canada, the Simon Wiesenthal Centre and the Jewish Civil Rights Educational Foundation, with the three groups calling Congress' proposal morally repugnant. Abella, meanwhile, also called on Ottawa to provide a public accounting of the government's efforts in the 250 cases Deschenes turned over to the Justice Department 10 years ago. He noted that in that time, Canada registered only one successful deportation. [Reuters photo]

Language bill attacked

MONTREAL — D'Arcy McGee MNA Lawrence Bergman drew the umbrage of the government when he said in the National Assembly restoring the powerful Commission de la protection de la langue française will provoke "moral outrage" here and abroad.

Parti Québécois (PQ) house leader Pierre Belanger accused Bergman of using "violent language" that is prohibited by parliamentary regulation.

Belanger was apparently most perturbed by Bergman's claim that the PQ is "inciting" such publications as La Tempete, a tract put out by radical ex-FLQ member Raymond Villeneuve, which recently featured an article headlined "English, go home, take the 401" that urges making anglophones uncomfortable in Quebec.

Bill 40, now before the assembly, would amend the Charter of the French Language to recreate the so-called "language police" that have such powers as entering businesses and looking through their files to see if they are complying with the language laws.

Bergman charged that the government's intention is "to make life here as unpleasant as possible for the anglophone community.

"The people of Quebec — francophones, anglophones, allophones, Quebec-born and those who have chosen this wonderful land — are ashamed of this bill and the harm and damage that you are causing to the anglophone community and all Quebecers."

He continued that the bill restricts individual liberties and will "severely penalize" small- and medium-sized businesses, even force them out of business.

He accused the government of trying to encourage "feelings of despair and exclusion" among anglophones and of "creating divisions and provoking intolerance."

International Affairs Minister Sylvain Simard also obliquely chastised Bergman referring to the Liberals' having made room for "extremists" and "extreme and panicky speeches."

Bergman later said he would not be dissuaded from speaking "the truth" publicly.

DISABLED VETERAN GETS HELP

Ralph Snow, (second from left) president of Beit Halochem Canada, presents a plaque to Jonathan Laski of Thornhill. After his bar mitzvah, Laski made a donation from his gifts requesting that it be used towards the airfare for a disabled veteran to visit Toronto. With Jonathan are his parents, Sol and Ann, who hosted a veteran in their home last summer.

Jewish births up in Winnipeg

By MYRON LOVE
Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — A study of Jewish demographic trends in Winnipeg indicates a continuing decline in the population in the 1980s, particularly among young adults.

At the same time, though, the number of children has been increasing at a faster rate than in any other Jewish community in Canada.

The 168-page report titled Unity and Continuity: Critical Issues Facing the Winnipeg Jewish Community was prepared by researchers James Torczyner and Shari Brotman of the McGill Consortium for Ethnicity and Strategic Social Planning. They did the study in conjunction with the Council of Jewish Federations-Canada, the Winnipeg Jewish Community Council and Statistics Canada. The findings were based on a comparison of the last three censuses.

As of 1991, according to census figures based on questions of religious and/or ethnic origin, Winnipeg had a Jewish population of about 15,000, an 18 percent decline from 1971. The one bright spot is that the number of children under 14 has increased by 3.7 percent since 1981. The figure for Canada as a whole in that period was 2.5 percent.

Evelyn Katz, the demographic statistician for Winnipeg's Jewish community, says that the numbers in the report gibe with hers in many respects — she was consulted by the researchers — but she questions how accurately the numbers have been interpreted.

"The 1991 census is a snapshot in time," she says. "Those are the given facts on the day the survey is done. Within a year, it is out of date: You can subsume certain patterns, but you can't take the numbers as factual in 1997."

One has to have familiarity with a community in order to properly interpret data about it, Katz observes. "You can't draw conclusions about Winnipeg from Montreal," she says.

For example, the census numbers indicate that a large percentage of Jewish widows in Winnipeg live below the poverty line. That is not an accurate picture, Katz says.

"A lot of people will only declare their pension income on the census," she says. "They won't list their other financial resources or what help they may be receiving from their families."

She agrees that Winnipeg has a high proportion of seniors in the Jewish community. People are living longer, and beyond a certain age, they are not likely to move away.

She predicts, however, that the ratio is about to change. Many Jewish seniors are in their 80s and 90s.

At the same time, a growing number of younger people who had left are now moving back married with children. The community has also made a concerted effort to persuade Jewish families from Argentina to settle here and has welcomed 25 new Jewish families from the former Soviet Union.

"We need to continue to attract more young families and we need more children," Katz says. "Our birthrate is still not high enough to replace the number of seniors who are dying. We have to continue our community outreach programs to Argentina and elsewhere. Winnipeg is a great place to raise a family and the economy continues to improve."

B.C. Klezmer band prepares for Ashkenaz

By DAVID LITVAK
Special to The CJN

VANCOUVER — On a recent cold, wet Saturday night, Macedonian Mazel-Tov, the Vancouver band chosen to represent the city at Toronto's annual Ashkenaz Festival of New Jewish Music, warmed the hearts of nearly 300 enthusiastic patrons at the JCC's Norman Rothstein Theatre here.

Performing an eclectic repertoire that includes klezmer, jazz, bebop and hip-hop, the band, which is led by Vancouver-born Michael Braverman on clarinet and sax, Israeli-born Moishe Reinert on accordion and Croatian-born Sylvia Zaradic on vocals, took the audience on a musical odyssey through Europe and the Middle East. They demonstrated why the band was worthy of being awarded a Foundation to Assist Canadian Talent on Record (Factor) grant that will enable the group to record their first CD, A Song for Peace.

The band, which also features Ron Thompson on guitar, Danny Parker on bass and Joel Fountain on drums, began the concert with some traditional klezmer music and then performed a jazzed up version of Bashana Ha'baah, an Israeli folk classic. The rest of the concert included songs culled from across Europe and Israel; stops in Bulgaria, Macedonia, Hungary, and Romania; a Croatian song called Carnations; and a Bulgarian Top 40 rap called Viseli Zborni that had the audience singing and clapping along.

Bird's Bulgar, an original tune that will be included in the band's upcoming CD, demonstrated the band's affinity with the late alto sax player Charley Parker and also its ability to fuse klezmer with bebop and jazz. Most of the band members are trained jazz musicians.

Zaradic sang in Croatian, Yiddish, Bulgarian, and Hebrew.

Complementing her vocals were Braverman's clarinet and saxophone (Braverman, who formed the band last summer, is also the band's arranger and composer) and the passionate accordion playing of Reinert.

He explained the origin and meaning of many of the songs that were performed throughout the course of the evening. He also said the band's name, Macedonian-Mazel-Tov indicated that they play Jewish music and acknowledges the Gypsy, Hungarian, Romanian, Bulgarian and Hungarian influences in Jewish music.

In keeping with its role as ambassadors for Jewish music, the band is helping to organize a Yiddish cabaret in Vancouver.

Chumash reveals family history

By LISA KELLER
Special to The CJN

CALGARY— A stranger's curiosity helped Murrey Dubinsky become closer to his father's memory.

"I'm quite overwhelmed by her efforts and of all the others who helped to find me," Dubinsky said from his Calgary home, referring to Winnipegger Molly Morris, who just couldn't stop wondering about a discovery she made in the spring of 1996.

Morris, office manager for the Law Society of Manitoba, had been doing some dusty work. She was sorting through the society's historical records which were boxed and forgotten about years ago. Her task was to get the records in order for microfilming. Instead, she found herself paging through an old Chumash which she found nestled, out of time and place, in a box of roll-books.

"What really caught my attention was the date," said Morris, who attempted to translate the handwritten Yiddish notes within the book's leaves.

She discovered the book had been published in 1887 in Kiev. The personal notes related to family names and birthdates. She also saw a stamp which indicated the book had been used in a 1919 hearing before the Law Society.

Most importantly, the documents detailing that hearing were tucked into the front of the Chumash.

The old legal papers related an incident in the life of one Boris Dubinsky. He was a 16-year-old boy who'd bluffed his way into law school in 1916. At that time, the law school required students to be at least 17 years of age.

During the hearing, the family Chumash was used to prove Dubinski's tender years. His own father's writing recorded his date of birth as 1900. Dubinsky was ejected from the school, and there ended the records.

"The pull for me at that point was that I'm an Orthodox Jew," Morris recalled. "Something had to be done..I felt the Chumash had to be handled with a great deal of respect."

A search of local phonebooks led to a dead-end. That's when Morris decided to enlist the aid of Bonnie Tregobov of the Jewish Historical Society of Western Canada. Based in Winnipeg, the Historical Society maintains a unique computerized database which is unrivaled for its size in Canada.

"We have over 60,000 entries put together...from all local Yiddish and English newspapers from 1911 to present. As long as it had a Jewish and a Western Canadian connection, it went into the database," Tregobov said.

"I just entered the name Dubinsky, and there it was!"

Successful lawyer

"It," was reference after reference to Boris Dubinsky, a man who, according to the articles, was a successful lawyer, bencher, and eventually, President of the Law Society of Saskatchewan.

It seems Dubinsky was not to be deterred. After his ignominious rejection by Manitoba, he moved west, finished his studies, and never looked back. He practised until 1982, dying just two years later at the age of 84.

The articles also referred to a son Murrey. But there was no mention of his profession or where he lived.

"After that, it was absolute chance to see if Murrey had decided to practise law," Morris laughed. A cross-country check revealed one Murrey Dubinsky, indeed practised law in Calgary. An officer of the Law Society phoned him, asked if his father's name was Boris, and told him about the prayer book.

"I had a number of reactions," Murrey Dubinsky said. "The first was amazement. The second was being totally overwhelmed that this ancient family Chumash was in existence."

The best part, Dubinsky said, was finally being able to fill in the blank in the family's history.

Dubinsky said for him, the story only reinforced his father's complete love of the law.

After moving to Saskatchewan, Boris Dubinsky completed his studies and articled with David Kliman, a prominent Regina lawyer. In 1926 he wrote the Saskatchewan Law Society exams and won the gold medal. His son still cherishes it.

As for the Chumash, the Law Society couriered it to Dubinsky, who found it in "amazing condition. Its sojourn in the basement of the Law Society did it no harm at all."

Dubinsky's mother, Boris Dubinsky's widow, who is 93 and living in Calgary, and Murrey's three children and two grandchildren have also expressed amazement at the book's return and interest in it for what it contains.

But the holy book would never have found its way home if not for the curiosity of a stranger. Of that, Dubinsky says: "The fact that Molly is an Orthodox Jew was so important because someone else may not have recognized the significance of the book."

"To have it in my possession is totally amazing."

'Hate groups' at Dawson College

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The Dawson College CEGEP is seeking to come to terms with the issue of alleged "hate groups" on campus following two incidents that sparked friction and angry verbal exchanges between Jewish and black students.

The incidents occurred during February's Black History Month in Montreal, when local representatives from the Nation of Islam (NOI) were invited onto the Dawson campus by two clubs, Dawson's African Student Association (DASA) and the African Background and Caribbean United Students (ABACUS) organization.

In one incident, Hillel students notified Dawson's security department and were then directed to the Student Services department when they saw members of NOI, which Hillel considers a "hate group" for the alleged racist and anti-Semitic comments of some of its leaders, distributing pamphlets in the school's Lower Atrium.

Angry verbal exchanges broke out between Hillel, DASA, and ABACUS members and Student Services director Michelle Serano-Claborough ordered the NOI off campus.

Territories closed after Tel Aviv bombing

By RAINE MARCUS
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

TEL AVIV — The suicide bomber who detonated a three-kilogram bomb packed with nails and pieces of metal in Tel Aviv last Friday was Moussa Ranimat, 28, of Kafr Tsurif near Hebron. His orange identity card was found on the terrace of the wrecked Apropo cafe.

A closure was imposed on the territories immediately following the attack, and the investigation of the case was transferred from the Tel Aviv police to the General Security Service (GSS). The home of Ranimat, a member of Hamas for the past two years, was sealed. Hamas claimed responsibility for the blast, in a phone call to Channel 1.

GSS chief Ami Ayalon met with Palestinian Authority (PA) security heads and demanded they immediately rearrest some 150 security prisoners released by the PA over the past two weeks.

Three women were killed in the explosion on the cafe terrace, 48 people were wounded, most of them suffering moderate to light wounds, and 19 victims were still hospitalized Saturday.

Anat Winter-Rosen, 32, a Herzliya lawyer and the mother of Shani, a 6-month-old girl who was also wounded in the blast, died from her wounds at Ichilov Hospital.

Dr. Michal Avrahami, 32, of Tel Aviv, a Wolfson Hospital radiologist who was expecting her first child, died shortly after being taken to hospital. Her husband and mother-in law were recovering at Ichilov from moderate wounds.

The third victim was Yael Gilad, 32, of Neveh Monosson.

Investigators said Ranimat had worked in two Rishon Lezion restaurants. The owners of one, Formaggio, were arrested and questioned. Ranimat had been investigated recently for suspected membership in Hamas.

The bag he carried containing the bomb was apparently given to him on the way to the packed Apropo cafe, sources said; he did not bring it from his village. Usually suicide bombers chosen by terror organizations are single, but Ranimat, the father of four, did not fit the profile. He had a permit to work in Israel.

Internal Security Minister Avigdor Kahalani, who arrived at the scene of the blast at the busy intersection of Ben-Gurion and Adam Hacohen streets, blasted Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat for giving the green light to terror organizations and for failing to prevent attacks.

"He does not have to give the go-ahead to terror organizations," said Kahalani. "It is sufficient that he just winks at them."

He was insistent that the Har Choma building project will continue.

Six-month-old girl unclaimed after attack

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

TEL AVIV — Perhaps the most unforgettable image of last Friday's suicide bombing was that of the 6-month-old baby girl in clown costume being carried away from the scene by a distraught policewoman.

Nobody had come to claim the baby, the radio reported all afternoon, repeating a police statement that "a possible link between the infant and one of the women who died in the attack was being examined."

The statue, Reuma, 1995, however, stood strong and defiant amidst the wreckage, broken glass and upturned tables at the front of the Apropo cafe.

The bronze statue of the headless nude woman on the terrace of the preserved Bauhaus building housing the cafe was the only object left intact, as police, the General Security Service, sappers looking for more bombs, forensic squads and the chevra kadisha sifted through the carnage, checking the documents and personal possessions scattered around the area. A bowl of salad still stood on one of the tables.

Unlike the suicide bombings last year, police and civilians seemed calmer to the sight of the carnage.

In the same spirit, Tel Aviv Mayor Ronni Milo announced that Purim events would go on. And like Reuma, those hardy residents of Tel Aviv not immediately affected by the terrorist's bomb defiantly stood up to the attempt to disrupt everyday life, and announced that Purim would continue as usual.

Peace talks tied to actions of PA

By MICHAL YUDELMAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – Israel's continuation of the peace process with the Palestinian Authority (PA) is conditional upon Chairman Yasser Arafat proving he is acting effectively to stop terrorism and fulfilling all the PA's commitments towards Israel, it was decided by the inner cabinet at a recent four-hour meeting.

This means that the first pullback from the West Bank, due to have started about two weeks ago, will not be carried out at this stage. Nor will other planned moves take place, including operating the Palestinian airport in Dahania and the Gaza port, releasing Palestinian prisoners and opening the "safe passage" between the Gaza Strip and West Bank.

A statement released after the meeting said: "The government of Israel demands from the Palestinian Authority that it uphold its commitments to fight terror and violence, as a necessary step, to furthering the political process."

However, Prime Minister Binyamin Netanyahu said he is not suspending talks with the PA. "Well, I'm not suspending talks because our people are meeting with their people, but the first item on the agenda is the fulfillment of the Palestinian obligation to fight terrorism. They have to start complying with that or else we can't move," Netanyahu told CNN.

The inner cabinet, which met in the Prime Minister's Office, was briefed that the PA had given terrorist organizations to understand that they have the "go-ahead" signal to carry out terrorist attacks. This understanding still stands and has not been changed, Cabinet Secretary Danny Naveh reported after the meeting.

The government is demanding that the PA keep the commitment it undertook only two months ago to fight against terrorism, as a condition for the continuation of the peace process.

These commitments include strengthening security cooperation with Israel, preventing incitement and hostile propaganda against Israel, fighting systematically and effectively against terror organizations and their infrastructure, arresting and trying terrorists, handling requests for extraditing suspects and collecting illegal firearms.

Several ministers at the meeting demanded imposing sanctions on Arafat and declaring that the negotiations with the Palestinians are "frozen" until Arafat arrests 150 Hamas and Islamic Jihad activists. But most ministers maintained a more moderate stand, reluctant to sever all ties with the PA.

The evaluation of Military Intelligence, he continued, is that the political deadlock has caused Arafat to feel threatened in his plans to achieve a Palestinian state with its capital in eastern Jerusalem. To break out of the deadlock, he has changed tactics to violent confrontation.

Ya'alon added that, in the most recent conflicts between rioters and IDF troops, Arafat's own Fatah took the lead in organizing confrontations. Shahak said the PA could halt the street violence, but the Palestinian interest is to bring about bloodshed and further escalation.

"It is unthinkable that, in order to overcome [negotiating] difficulties, the Palestinians would employ terrorism as an instrument to solve these problems," Shahak said.

The chief of staff acknowledged that Israel has less means than in the past with which to prevent and combat terrorism as a part of the political process. "The PA has a bigger responsibility. We're not speaking here of the question whether they have the ability to prevent terrorism, but the will to do so," Shahak said.

So far he does not see a need for the IDF to enter areas under Palestinian control. "This would be an admission of failure in the attempts to resolve disputes by means of a dialogue between the sides," said Shahak. "I want to hope that we do not reach such a situation, for this would have far-reaching implications."

Meanwhile, clashes erupted in Hebron for a third day last Sunday, as the Palestinian police defended its record in bringing them under control and blamed Israel for causing them in the first place.

The clashes were far smaller than the riots of last Friday and Saturday, and the Palestinian police was seen to impose order more quickly. The IDF removed the curfew it imposed on the area of the city where Israel retains control.

In Gaza, meanwhile, doubts emerged over Palestinian security reports that Ibrahim Makadmeh, a militant Hamas leader who spoke out in favor of suicide attacks at a Khan Yunis rally last week, had been arrested together with 30 other militants. He was being investigated, said some security sources; while others said he was not arrested, but not at home either.

Palestinian Authority Attorney General Khalid Qidrah said there is a warrant out for Makadmeh's arrest for incitement, Itim reported.

Ya'alon accused Rajoub and Fatah activists under him of leading the earlier riots in Hebron. Rajoub himself met with Internal Security Minister Avigdor Kahalani and reasserted that the police had done everything it could, despite Israel's "crazy policies."

"We will make every effort to end violence, which firstly harms Palestinian interests," Rajoub said at a televised press conference with Kahalani.

Kahalani noted the two internal security chiefs hardly knew each other until last Sunday. Their meeting lasted 75 minutes, "because it is important to get to know each other," Kahalani said. "We are eager to establish a channel of communications, so we have established a direct line between our offices."

Kahalani said he would introduce Rajoub to the new Judea and Samaria police commanders.

There was little Palestinian reaction to government indications that it was suspending political talks with the PA until the security situation improves.

Orthodox group to issue 'explosive declaration'

NEW YORK — The 600-member Union of Orthodox Rabbis of the United States and Canada (Agudath Harabonim) is about to release a formal ruling stating that the religious practices of the Conservative and Reform branches of Judaism are not Jewish under Jewish law.

The explosive declaration, which would deny the legitimacy of the religious doctrines of the groups that represent as many as 90 percent of North American Jews, is to be announced March 31 at a news conference in New York by the Union of Orthodox Rabbis of the United States and Canada.

The Union, founded in 1902, is described in the Encyclopedia Judaica as "militantly Orthodox." It is separate from the more moderate Union of Orthodox Jewish Congregations of America, generally known as the Orthodox Union, whose rabbinical arm, the Rabbinical Council of America, has more than 1,000 members.

The ruling's aim is to persuade Conservative and Reform Jews to abandon their congregations and join Orthodox synagogues. It comes at a sensitive time, as the Conservative and Reform movements are fighting conversion legislation in Israel that would delegitimize conversions performed abroad by the movements' rabbis.

"Having caused havoc in the United States, leading generations of Jews toward assimilation and intermarriage [Reform and Conservative leaders] now attempt to export their alien ideology to Israel," the document states.

Should non-Orthodox conversions ultimately be accepted in Israel, the result, the rabbis fear, will be "a terrible confusion as to who is really Jewish," according to a press release issued on behalf of the organization.

Orthodox rabbis have long refused to recognize the religious authority of their Reform and Conservative counterparts. But the rabbinical union said its formal declaration will mark the first time an Orthodox rabbinical body has made such a declaration as a ruling in Jewish law.

The rabbinical union described its ruling in the news release as "a clarion call that, despite their brazen usurpation of the titles 'Judaism, Jewish heritage, Jewish tradition' and 'Jewish continuity,' Reform and Conservative are not Judaism at all. They are outside of Torah and outside of Judaism."

When contacted by The CJN, Rabbi Hersh Ginsberg, director and acting chair of the Union of Orthodox Rabbis, said the adherents of the Conservative and Reform movements are Jewish if born to a Jewish mother, but "their religion is not Judaism."

This is not a new concept, said Rabbi Moshe Stern, chair of Toronto's Vaad Harabonim, who is not a member of the New York-based organization and had not seen the ruling. "They [the non-Orthodox] themselves will admit that some of their concepts fall out of the realm of Torah and traditional Judaism."

Rabbi Stern said that any conversion is acceptable if it is "done according to Halachah," but questioned how "a person who espouses a philosophy that negates Halachah" could perform a halachically correct conversion.

Although Chief Rabbi Pinchas Hirschsprung of Montreal was named in the news release as one of several rabbis issuing statements of support for the ruling, he did not sign any such statement and is not getting involved in the issue, said his son on his behalf.

The ruling was termed "pathetic" by Reform Rabbi Dow Marmur of Holy Blossom Temple. "It should be treated with the contempt it deserves. It will make no difference to non-Orthodox Jews."

Conservative Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl agrees the ruling will have no impact. "Zip — and you can quote me," he said, adding in a more reflective vein, "It's a shame that there are Jews, and rabbis, who are unable to accept the historical reality of religious pluralism and the theological validity of a variety of Jewish religious expression.

"It would be far better if these rabbis were to say, 'We will work together with Reform and Conservative rabbis to develop common standards and procedures for conversion to ensure that there's a universal acceptance,' [rather than] making a unilateral declaration about what they believe is normative."

Palestinians riot near Israeli-controlled Hebron

Protesters hurl rocks at the IDF. RNS/Reuters

By JON IMMANUEL and MARGOT DUDKEVITCH
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Hundreds of Palestinians rushed the area between Palestinian and Israeli-controlled Hebron in three separate onslaughts last weekend, leaving dozens of Palestinians and several Israelis wounded.

But both sides kept to their respective zones, avoiding any direct contact that might have escalated the riots.

Hebron's Alya Hospital reported treating 92 people wounded in the clashes, including 10 who were in serious condition, suffering from bullet wounds.

An IDF spokesperson said soldiers fired some live bullets when "their lives were in danger." Twelve soldiers and border police and an Israeli boy were lightly wounded, the army said.

The IDF imposed a complete closure on the territories last Friday afternoon. Jewish residents in Hebron were free to to travel within the community, the IDF spokesperson said. The Machpela Cave was open Saturday for prayers, but because of the curfew imposed on the Palestinian sector, only Wakf (Muslim religious authority) leaders were permitted to pray there.

Clashes started when a large crowd surged towards Beit Hadassah, throwing hundreds of stones, said Hebron Jewish community spokesperson Noam Arnon.

During the first hours, IDF troops did not intervene, Arnon said, nor did the Palestinian police do anything to stop them.

When IDF soldiers began to push the rioters back, they were hit with rocks and firebombs. Settlers claimed that IDF troops fired tear gas and rubber bullets towards the rioters, but Palestinians threw rocks and tear gas canisters back towards the soldiers.

According to the IDF spokesperson, high ranking officers met with Palestinians, including Haj Ismail Jabr, the West Bank police commander, demanding that the Palestinian police prevent disturbances in the areas under their control.

Friday's clashes stopped soon after 2 p.m., when news of the suicide bombing in Tel Aviv apparently compelled the Palestinian police to control the rioters.

But Sunday, Palestinian police officers seemed to allow the stone throwers to continue for about two hours during each of two waves of rioting, before coming in force to move them from the scene. They intervened only when the rioters tried to engage Israeli troops more closely. The clashes were some 100 metres from Shuhada Street, close to where dozens of settlers live.

Behind the rioters were thousands of chanting supporters, shouting "Down with peace, up with Hamas," and "Allah is great." Twice they burned the Israeli flag to excited chanting before charging down the road toward Israeli positions.

Preventive Security chief Jibril Rajoub appeared periodically on Shallala Street during the rioting and then left without intervening.

"We have the determination and the ability to control the situation, but the tension is very great because of Netanyahu's crazy policy," Rajoub told reporters.

Regarding the settlers' complaints about the IDF response, the IDF spokesperson said that on Friday the army sent additional forces to Hebron and that the army had stressed to the Palestinians that they are responsible for maintaining the peace under their jurisdiction. The IDF, said the spokesperson, will continue to safeguard the Jewish community in Hebron.

March 17

• A group of 14 Israeli high school students studying Arabic and Islamic culture returned from a trip to Malaysia. The students had been invited there by the country's prime minister.

March 18

• Construction began on the Har Choma housing project.

• Israeli media reported that Jordanian riot police set up a roadblock to prevent sympathizers of the Jordanian soldier who killed seven Israeli schoolgirls from paying respects to his family. Jordan's opposition party urged the government to stop "condemning and criminalizing" the soldier.

• Justice Minister Tzahi Hanegbi was questioned for more than eight hours on the Bar-On affair.

March 19

• One Israeli soldier was killed and three others wounded when Hezbollah attacked their patrol in southern Lebanon.

March 20

• Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu proposed an accelerated schedule for the final status talks with the Palestinians to tackle, as soon as possible, the remaining difficult issues in the peace talks.

• IDF warplanes struck Hezbollah targets in southern Lebanon.

• Palestinians protested construction on Har Choma, by marching on Rachel's Tomb in Bethlehem and throwing stones and molotov cocktails at Israeli troops.

March 21

• President Ezer Weizman came out in support of the prime minister's proposal to accelerate final-status discussions with the Palestinian Authority.

• Five Jewish families moved into the City of David area in the neighborhood of Silwan. the families said they purchased the property legally from Arab owners. With files from the JTA.

Relations improve

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

If words mean anything, Israel and Russia have achieved a quantum leap in their evolving relationship.

Mideast Analysis

When Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu left Russia earlier this month, following a 48-hour trip to Moscow, he waxed enthusiastically about Israeli-Russian ties. Describing Russia as "a new-found friend," he proclaimed a "new era" in relations and declared that the "enmity and adversity" of the past had been replaced by a pattern of surging mutual contacts.

President Boris Yeltsin, who said he had accepted an invitation to go to Israel, struck a similar note. As he put it: "Our countries and their leaders have passed the stage of prejudice and are now energetically moving toward each other."

Netanyahu's visit took place as Israel and Russia were emerging from a period of tension and at a time when Moscow is seeking to expand its influence in the Middle East.

Israel's growing friendship with Russia soured last April during Operation Grapes of Wrath. Israel's massive bombardment of southern Lebanon was launched in response to Hezbollah attacks against civilian settlements in the Galilee.

As the fighting raged, Russian Foreign Minister Yevgeny Primakov — a Jew — embarked on a tour of the region. While in Beirut, shortly before his arrival in Jerusalem, Primakov characterized Israel's actions as "terrorist" in nature.

In the wake of this incident, Russia expelled an Israeli diplomat in Moscow, calling him a Mossad spy. Meanwhile, the Russian government announced that the Jewish Agency, which has facilitated the emigration of hundreds of thousands of Jews from the former Soviet Union since 1989, would have to cease operations in Russia.

The mini crisis was defused several months later, when Moscow granted the Jewish Agency an official permit to operate throughout Russia indefinitely. And in the interval, another bilateral problem was amicably solved when Israel agreed that Russia was the rightful owner of an ensemble of properties — the Holy Trinity Russian Orthodox Church, parts of the Russian Compound and a parking lot — in the western half of Jerusalem.

In January, the momentum continued when Natan Sharansky, Israel's trade minister and a former Refusenik, led a large delegation of officials and business leaders to Moscow. Upon leaving, he said that Israeli relations with Russia should be brought up "to a much higher level." This, he explained, would lead to a "more constructive" Russian role in the Middle East.

Since its co-sponsorship of the Madrid peace talks six years ago, Moscow has played a positive role in the Mideast. And of late, Russia has been seeking a stronger voice in the Oslo peace process, which is dominated by the United States.

In an effort to counter Washington's dominance in the region, as well as to increase its arms exports there, Russia has courted Syria and such pariah states as Iran, Iraq, Libya and Sudan.

Israel is particularly concerned by the sale of Russian nuclear technology to Iran, whose Islamic regime rejects Israel's very existence. Israel believes that Iran may use this technology for military purposes. But Yeltsin told Netanyahu that Russian nuclear cooperation with Iran remains on "a very rudimentary level," while Primakov denied that Russia is helping Iran to build ballistic missiles.

In addition to this contentious issue, Israel is troubled by reports that Russia intends to modernize Syria's arsenal. On another front, Netanyahu and Yeltsin agreed to disagree on Israel's much-maligned Har Choma housing project in Jerusalem.

Despite these differences, the volume of trade is booming, having passed the $500 million mark per annum.

By ARYEH DEAN COHEN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

Britain's Chief Rabbi Jonathan Sacks rarely saw eye-to-eye on religious matters with the late Rabbi Hugo Gryn of the UK's Reform movement, but Rabbi Sacks could hardly have foreseen the storm his decision to attend a memorial service for Rabbi Gryn would unleash among British Jewry.

The outcry surrounding the incident, which has Rabbi Sacks under attack from both the left and right flanks of British Jewry, is largely the result of the leaking of a letter he wrote to a haredi leader in London explaining why he attended the ceremony. In the letter, he referred to Rabbi Gryn as "one of those who destroy the faith."

The letter was leaked to the Jewish Chronicle by "a right-wing Orthodox movement," according to a source close to the chief rabbi, a group whose members are "personally very envious" of the status of the chief rabbi. It appeared earlier this month, along with an article by Rabbi Sacks explaining the circumstances of his writing it.

Rabbi Sacks' comments naturally incensed the non-Orthodox community, who have blasted the chief rabbi, already under fire from haredi circles for attending the service in the first place. He did not attend Rabbi Gryn's funeral because it took place in a Reform synagogue.

Ironically, it was to explain his decision to go to the memorial service that Rabbi Sacks wrote the letter on Jan. 20, marked "not for publication," to rabbi and religious court judge (dayan) Hanokh Dov Padwa, head of the Union of Orthodox Hebrew Congregations' rabbinical court.

At the ceremony, Rabbi Sacks extolled Rabbi Gryn for his courage, adding: "This was a mentsh. In the deepest sense, this was a man. We were privileged to have him amongst us, and count him as a friend."

Rabbi Gryn was a Holocaust survivor who became a pillar of the post-war Reform Jewish community in Britain, and his popular BBC radio program, The Moral Maze, made him a well-known personality among Jews and non-Jews alike. Known as much for his humanism as his Judaism, he once spent a night in jail with the Rev. Martin Luther King, Jr., after marching with him in Selma, Ala.

However, in the letter to Padwa, Rabbi Sacks blasted Reform, Liberal and Masorti Judaism, saying that "they have no enemy or opponent equal to the chief rabbi." He also explained that he attended as "the representative of the whole Jewish community," noting that failing to do so would undermine the idea that British Jews "know that there is a single religious representative of the Jewish community...in which the voice that is heard is the voice of Jacob, and that the Reform and Liberal movements do not have significant standing amongst us."

Despite Rabbi Sacks' efforts to clarify his letter, it may lead to what he feared most — an attempt by Liberal, Reform and Masorti Jews to appoint their own chief rabbi, whom Rabbi Sacks will have to contend with for recognition at official state functions, as well as at Jewish community ones.

'Impossible position'

The incident only highlights the increasing pressure on Rabbi Sacks from disparate sectors of the Jewish community.

Rabbi David Rosen, former chief rabbi of Ireland and currently Director of Interfaith Relations at the Anti-Defamation League office in Jerusalem, says the incident shows that "as in Israel, trying to mollify haredi interests won't serve the centrist leadership, only undermine it."

"Jonathan Sacks is in an almost impossible position," said Rabbi Michael Marmur, the English-born rabbi of the Ohel Avraham Synagogue at Haifa's Leo Baeck Education Centre. "On the one hand, he's a brilliant, educated, urbane, witty man. On the other, he is beholden to religious officials, many of whom regard any idea of outreach, particularly regarding Jews of other denominations, as anathema."

Rabbi Marmur said the episode showed the "ambiguity or impossibility of Rabbi Sacks' situation. He's tried to appease his more Orthodox constituency by explaining his appearance in terms of Rabbi Gryn's being an [Auschwitz] survivor, but not regarding his being a rabbi. He may have judged wrong on all counts...He's been too liberal for the hard-right Orthodox flank, but appears to a lot of the British public at large, and certainly to progressive Jews, as a wolf in sheep's clothing. He may have succeeded in alienating both his constituencies."

Rabbi Marmur believes the incident may lead non-Orthodox Jews, who were prepared to forgive Rabbi Sacks for not attending Rabbi Gryn's funeral, to lose their patience and question whether they can continue to accept him as chief rabbi of all British Jews. "By coming up against the figure of Hugo Gryn, he may have forced the issue," Rabbi Marmur said.

In a bid to heal the wounds caused by the incident, Rabbi Sacks pleaded in his article for "an end to public bickering." He called on Anglo-Jewish leaders and organizations to form a "coalition for peace in the community," which would subscribe to seven points, including: "We will state clearly that those who sow dissension and dishonor Jewish values do not represent the community."

Haredim seek solutions for dealing with CP

By JUDY SIEGEL-ITZKOVICH
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Rochele lies on a thick foam mattress surrounded by toys and waits for her turn with the physiotherapist. The only things that seem to move in this four-year-old with cerebral palsy (CP) are her eyes: her pupils dart constantly from one side to another, as if they were trying to escape from a body that doesn't work properly.

The child is one of 80, aged one to 13 who are being cared for at Tikvah Layeled, a CP rehabilitation and special-education centre in Jerusalem's Bayit Vegan quarter. It's the only such facility in the capital for children from the haredi community with CP – a community, which for years tended to virtually hide such children in closets for fear that their mere existence would harm their siblings' chances for a good match for marriage.

Today, the problems and needs of physically and even mentally disabled children in the haredi community have emerged from the closet, and families stricken by such disorders have set up voluntary organizations to meet their unique needs.

Fifteen years ago, it happened to Zvi Braitstein and his wife Sheindele. They had two healthy children, and then triplets were born: two healthy girls and one boy, Yoel, who was different. Zvi, a 13th-generation Jerusalemite, made his living producing leather housings for tefillin, and he had never even heard of cerebral palsy.

He soon learned that the condition strikes 0.7 percent of all babies, affects over 10,000 Israelis, and is caused by injury to the central nervous system during pregnancy, delivery or soon after. When Yoel's problem was finally diagnosed at the age of two, Zvi took him and the whole family to Brooklyn, where he was put in touch with another tefillin-maker who had a son with CP and who ran a rehabilitation institute for such children. "I met numerous Israeli families like ours who left the country to get help for their children in a religious atmosphere," recalls Zvi.

Cared for by nuns

Although Zvi found work in his vocation in New York, the Braitsteins wanted to return to Jerusalem, but they could do so only if they had a suitable place for treating Yoel. He was enrolled in the rehabilitative kindergarten directed by the late pediatric neurologist Prof. Naomi Amir, and he progressed neurologically. But the parents felt uncomfortable that their son, who is a bright boy, didn't get the type of religious training to which they were accustomed. "There are some 200 severely disabled Jewish children, some of them haredim, under care of nuns in Ein Kerem. Their parents may feel they have no alternative, but we wanted our son to live with us, and we needed help.

"We dreamed of setting up a CP clinic; we never dreamed of being able to develop the facilities we have today," continues Braitstein. Tikvah Layeled's main facility is Neveh Zvi, a five-storey rented apartment building at 16 Rehov Sha'are Torah in Jerusalem. CP youngsters — not only haredim but also from non-religious and modern Orthodox families — are bused in, and spend more than eight hours a day with a staff of teachers and physical and occupational therapists.

There are computers, special therapeutic equipment (including customized boots that hold the feet straight to stretch spastic hamstrings), electric wheelchairs and catered meals for the children, whose parents pay a nominal NIS 100 to NIS 150 a month for care. The rest is covered by contributions from the Jerusalem Municipality, the ministries of Education and Labor and Social Affairs, and by private donors.

One of the most moving experiences, recalls Braitstein, was going into the building recently and seeing the whole staff and children overcome with emotion.

Marvin Samuels, a New York philanthropist, serves as president of the organization, and Canadian businessman Albert Reichmann is a member of the board.

ates a broad volunteer program that directly helps parents function on a daily basis.

Braitstein, now the father of 13, living in the Ramot quarter of Jerusalem, worries about what will happen when the youngsters reach the age of 18. "We will add extra classrooms as they get older, but when they reach adulthood, someone else will have to establish a place for them."

As it is, Tikvah Layeled has a long waiting list, and could double or triple the number of youngsters if it had the facilities. It only now received a donation to install an elevator in the building; until it is built, parents and therapists have

In addition to Neveh Zvi, Tikvah Layeled also supports the local production of children's wheelchairs and therapeutic workstations for free distribution to hospitals, institutions and private families. It also brings foreign medical experts here for training local doctors in the most advanced methods and operations, sponsors symposiums, provides personal family counseling, organizes CP parent support groups and operto carry them up the stairs.

Editor's career in film began with a bar mitzvah gift

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to the CJN

TORONTO — What started out as a childhood passion for Allan Novak has blossomed into a full-time career.

"Since I was 11, I have been obsessed with making movies and [creating] special effects. All I wanted for my bar mitzvah was a super-eight movie camera," says the 38-year-old editor of CBC's The Newsroom, a half-hour satire show about broadcast journalism written and directed by Ken Finkleman.

Novak, originally from Winnipeg, is a also a producer, writer and director. "As soon as I got that camera and began making comedy films in my basement, I knew I had found my calling. It is wonderful to have always been clear about what I wanted to do with my life. The thing I love to do is the thing I do best," he said in a recent telephone interview from his CBC office.

He broke into the industry, he said, after graduating from the film course at York University and he and a room-mate began producing comedy documentaries about house parties.

"I got my first directing job from those tapes. It was always out of passion that I have been successful," he said.

The Newsroom, which debuted last October and is showing its last new episodes until March 31, "is the best thing I've ever edited," says Novak. "I am very proud of it. [The show] is original and it has broken a lot of rules of situation comedies. It is fresh, satirical and real."

What is innovative about the show, he said, is that "while a lot of editing jobs merely require polishing, here, we rewrite in the editing room. Combining information in the editing process has infinite possibilities. We can run something backwards, add lines or drop scenes. I have been editing for 15 years and have never worked on a show where the footage has been so malleable. It turns [it] into something really special and the audience does not know what we've done. We have created ways of blending that really work."

Now that his work is complete on The Newsroom, Novak is producing, directing and editing a behind-the-scenes look at the series that should run in the fall. Also in the works is a show about the co-founders of Roots, the Canadian retailer and manufacturer.

Brother-sister classical music team a special treat

By MORDECHAI BEN-DAT
Editor

TORONTO — Very seldom at a duet performance of classical music does an audience see on stage obvious gestures of generosity and deference between performers.

But that was precisely what the audience witnessed between Gil and Orli Shaham last week at the George Weston Recital Hall of the Ford Centre for the Performing Arts.

Gil Shaham, 26, has already established a following and an international renown as one of the world's most exciting, young violin virtuosos. He debuted at the age of 10 with the Jerusalem Symphony and the Israeli Philharmonic Orchestra.

He has played with major symphony orchestras around the world including those in New York, Boston, Cleveland, Montreal, Berlin, Hamburg, Paris and Israel, to name only some.

He shared both spotlight and stage with his 21-year-old sister Orli at the piano last week in a four-piece program that began with Dvorak's Sonatina in G for violin and piano, Op. 100, ended with Dvorak's Violin Sonata in F major, Op. 57, and featured Beethoven's Sonata No. 7 in C minor, Op. 30, No. 2 and Korngold's Suite from Shakespeare's Much Ado about Nothing, Op. 11 in between.

Shaham dominated the stage, front and centre, vibrant and expressive, moving from time to time toward his co-performer and back toward the audience, a swaying mirror of the music's emotion.

The most evocative of the pieces was the first. It carried the listener across a range of emotions from the light, dancing pizzicato touches of the violin's bow to the stormy and more determined flourishes of the keyboard.

The Beethoven Sonata, the most serious and sonorous of the works, was also a showcase for the pleasant blending of musical voices.

Throughout the program, the violin phrasing was precise and expressive, a perfect entertainment for the marvellous acoustics of the chamber. At times, the inexperience of the pianist was evident in what this reviewer will call an excess of energy and enthusiasm. The sweep of the piano fortissimos overpowered the more delicate strains of the violin.

At the end of the evening, what the audience was left with was a sense of the effort and spirit that human beings must pour into a masterpiece, its mastery and the master. The young performers were called back by six curtain calls to perform two encores.

From where I sat, I could see Shaham's movements in the dreamy burnished reflection in the square, polished brass plate on the large double doors of the hall.

It was an appropriate symbol for the evening.

Ship of Fools has aged well

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Some movies age badly, mouldering into paragons of silly high camp. No such fate has befallen Ship of Fools, directed by Stanley Kramer in 1965, and scheduled to be aired on TVOntario on March 29 at 8 p.m.

Ship of Fools, adapted from Katherine Anne Porter's novel by Abby Mann, has navigated the inter-generational shoals skillfully, and remains as spellbinding as it was 32 years ago.

This literate, lavishly-appointed 150-minute slice-of-life film is as smooth as a tranquil pond, with beautifully-realized performances by a medley of European and American actors.

A German ocean liner sets off from a scruffy Mexican port, bound for Bremerhaven, Germany. It is 1933 and Adolf Hitler has just been appointed chancellor. Aboard the vessel is a mixed group of passengers, ranging from a coterie of Mexican sugar workers and a sleazy Spanish dance troupe to a simple American baseball player and an opinionated Nazi sympathizer.

In Kramer's hands, these diverse characters are putty, and he makes the best of the opportunity. Ship of Fools is thus a high-quality soap opera of sorts, a film which mercilessly exposes human foibles, foolishness, cruelties and vanities.

The narrator is a German dwarf (Michael Dunn) who acts as a compassionate observer of the pathos in his midst. He shares a supper table with a patriotic German Jew (Heinz Ruehmann) whose optimism about the future is pathetically misplaced. The latter tells a now-famous joke about Jews and bicycle riders which embodies his faith in humanity.

Jose Ferrer portrays an anti-Semitic German magazine publisher who sees in Hitler the dawn of a brighter era, while Oskar Werner plays the ship's melancholy doctor, a man who has a shipboard romance with Simone Signoret, a bedraggled drug addict.

The cast is rounded off by Vivien Leigh, a love-starved middle-aged coquette; George Segal, an artist with a social conscience; Elizabeth Ashley, his demanding girlfriend; and Lee Marvin, the ballplayer.

Ship of Fools, though, is not without its flaws. My major complaint is that it is padded; the editor should have been more ruthless in cutting away the fat from the bone. Be that as it may, Ship of Fools promises viewers an enjoyable voyage into turbulent waters.

In its wake, tune in to Judgment at Nuremberg, which Kramer directed four years earlier. Based on the 1946 war crimes trial of Nazi bigwigs, Judgment at Nuremberg is powered along by a stellar cast consisting of Spencer Tracy, Burt Lancaster, Maximilian Schell, Marlene Dietrich and Montgomery Clift. Abby Mann's screenplay crackles with energy.

Spotlight on counter-missionary

On March 26 at 7 p.m., Vision TV's Skylight series on proselytizing presents a segment about a Toronto Jew who embraced the Jews for Jesus movement, subsequently rejected it and founded Jews for Judaism.

Julius Ciss joined Jews for Jesus as a result of a romance with a Christian woman. When he finally realized his mistake, he quit and became a counter missionary. An instructive program.

Individual programs, $8. Carol, 416-789-3213.

In The Spotlight

In Israel recently, I dropped into the offices of the Jerusalem Report and was surprised to meet 19-year-old Matti Friedman, who is not only a fellow Torontonian but also a fellow graduate of my alma mater, W. L. MacKenzie C.I. in north Toronto.

Turns out Matti has been hired in an intern position lasting until June. He's been reporting and writing for the magazine that he justly says offers "the best English-language reporting that comes out of Israel."

His family is planning to come to Israel in June for a residency of at least a year. By then, however, Matti expects to go into the army, since he's made aliyah and plans to live in Israel permanently.

Readers of The CJN may remember that Matti was the focus of an article a couple of years back. He won a Bronfman Youth Fellowship to attend a summer program in Israel after the 11th grade. His father, Ralph Friedman, teaches philosophy at the University of Toronto.

Travel Talk

A VISIT TO TAYBET ZAMAN

The desert night was cool and pure as spring water. Under cover of darkness, the sky had dropped the misty veil it had worn at twilight, revealing a vast black ocean studded with thousands of stars.

The bus was swaddled in a blackness broken only by our own and oncoming headlights and the occasional clustered lights of villages floating in the hills. A road sign announced Petra, the only indication that the ancient fabled city with its myriad rock-carved temples and tombs lay in the vicinity.

Soon we reached our destination, Taybet Zaman, perhaps the most distinctive new resort in the region, built on the site of an abandoned 19th-century village.

The architecture is a pleasing mix of grand stone arches and vaults, whitewashed plaster walls, marble floors, solid woodwork and rough-hewn sand-colored brick.

To reach my room, I headed through a cobblestone courtyard and a maze of narrow streets and stairways. Pushing open the heavy wooden door, I entered a generously-proportioned chamber with a high vaulted ceiling and heated stone floor. The room was simply furnished and dominated by a graceful stone arch. A television and mini-bar were hidden in a niche behind a curtain. The effect was instantly relaxing.

At one with its natural surroundings, Taybet Zaman offers an array of non-intrusive modern conveniences as well as restaurants and cafes, handicraft shuk, pool and fitness facilities, and a Hammam or Turkish bath.

"We were occupied by the Turks for 500 years," said general manager Osama Dabbas, "and during that time we learned to appreciate two things — Turkish coffee and Turkish baths."

Built by a Jordanian company, Taybet Zaman is one of many new hotels that have opened or are under construction in Jordan since the country's mid-1995 peace treaty with Israel. Lured by impressive statistics, international hotel chains like Hilton, Hyatt, Marriott, Movenpick, Radisson-SAS and Sheraton are building here.

In 1995 foreign visitors to Jordan increased by 25 percent to one million, and the number of annual visitors to Petra — bolstered by a rush of Israelis across the newly opened Arava border crossing between Aqaba and Eilat — more than doubled to 337,000.

Trying to keep abreast of the boom, the Jordanians are hectically installing water, electricity and other essential infrastructures at tourist sites across the country.

Having introduced numerous liberalizing economic and political reforms in recent years, the government seems as firmly committed to them as it is to peace with Israel, which has become a central plank of its three-pronged program for prosperity.

"We felt that the Madrid conference laid down the principal that the Arab-Israeli problem will be solved by peaceful means," said Dr. Marwan Muasher, head of the Ministry of Information. "We advocate a model that involves a warm peace and good relations between Jordan and Israel."

These days, an increasing number of North American Jewish groups are venturing into Jordan. At Taybet Zaman, I encountered a group of 22 travelers from Beth Am, a Reform congregation from Los Altos Hills, Calif., as they were leaving for a half-day excursion to Petra.

"This is some of the most beautiful country on earth, and there's much here of Jewish interest, such as Aaron's tomb and the relics of the Moabites and other biblical peoples," said group leader Rabbi Richard Block.

"We're planning to have a morning service at Petra."

Sure enough, a couple of hours later, as I stood atop a colossal ancient monument at Petra and looked across at the mountain where the biblical Aaron was supposedly buried, the strains of a Hebrew prayer — and in particular, the words Ya'aseh Shalom, "He will make peace" — wafted through the clear desert air from a group of singers under canopy far below.

Bill Gladstone travelled to Jordan and Israel at the invitation of the tourism ministries of both countries. He flew Toronto to Amman via Royal Jordanian and returned from Tel Aviv via Air Canada.

Wait there's more... Travel, Arts & Business continues on Page 51.

French Jews condemn attack on mosque

By LEE YANOWITCH
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

PARIS — France's Jewish community voiced its sympathy with local Muslims after a crude bomb ripped through a mosque in northeast Paris, slightly injuring its caretaker.

CRIF, France's umbrella group for secular Jewish organizations, said in a statement issued hours after last week's pre-dawn explosion in the Al-Dawsa Mosque that it "vigorously condemns" the attack and "expresses all of its sympathy to the Muslim community aggrieved by this cowardly act. CRIF hopes that the guilty [are found] as quickly as possible," the statement added.

The mosque's caretaker suffered minor hand injuries in the blast. Two other people were treated for shock.

No one claimed responsibility for the attack.

Police suspect that the bomb, a fire extinguisher stuffed with explosives, was planted either by French extremists or by Algerian Islamic fundamentalists.

It was the first attack at a Paris mosque since the 1995 shooting death of an imam, or Islamic cleric.

The shooting presaged a wave of bombings in France that year by Muslim extremists who accuse the French government of backing Algeria's military rulers.

Eight people died and nearly 200 were injured in the extremists' subsequent terror campaign.

More recently, a bomb planted in an underground train killed four people last December. The explosives were of the type used in the 1995 bombings.

The head of the Al-Dawsa Mosque, Kechat Larbi, is known as a liberal who has promoted relations with other religions.

Local residents said leaflets had been distributed in the neighborhood in the week before the attack demanding that he take a more traditional stance.

While suspecting Islamic extremists, police did not rule out the possibility that the bombing was the work of racists.

The extreme right-wing National Front staged several protests in recent months against plans to build an extension to the mosque.

The anti-immigrant party advocates expelling France's three million mostly North African immigrants and reserving jobs and welfare benefits for French nationals.

Front leader Jean-Marie Le Pen, who won 15 percent of the vote in France's 1995 presidential elections, has made anti-Semitic remarks in past speeches.

Three fascists jailed

By DEBORAH LEIPZIGER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LONDON — Three members of the fascist group Combat 18 were jailed last week for inciting racial hatred.

The three men pleaded guilty to charges of possessing "threatening, abusive or insulting material." The three had literature with precise instructions for making bombs.

They were ordered jailed for between 12 and 17 months.

Combat 18 states that its aims are to "ship all non-whites back to Africa, Asia, Arabia, alive or in body bags, the choice is theirs."

Another aim is "to execute all Jews who have actively helped to damage the white race and to put into camps the rest until we find a solution for the eternal Jew."

Combat 18 was involved in a campaign targeting high-profile sports and theater personalities for their friendships with Jews. Other targets had married partners of a different race.

Such campaigns have given Combat 18 a higher profile in the past few months.

According to Tony Lerman of the Institute for Jewish Policy Research, Combat 18 has received a sudden "burst of publicity."

Lerman believes that Combat 18 is following a pattern similar to other groups in Europe. Because of the failure of the extreme right to influence governments, fascist groups are developing a more violent rhetoric in order to get their message across.

Several anti-fascist groups complained that the sentences were too lenient. Lerman maintains that the three arrests were significant.

"Police have been taking the matter seriously," he said. "It is a difficult balance because the police do not want to make martyrs out of them."

Israeli juniors face anti-Semitic incidents at tourney

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For the second time in three months, anti-Semitic incidents swirled around an Israeli hockey team competing in an International Ice Hockey Federation (IIHF) tournament in Europe.

Israeli youngsters playing in an IIHF Pool D Under-18 tournament in Belgrade were taunted with epithets like "effing Jew" and one Israeli player was spit upon outside the dressing room during a game against the host Yugoslavs.

In addition, Yugoslav fans threw firecrackers and at least one chair at young hockey players from Iceland, Turkey and Spain who cheered for the Israelis. Police were called upon to break up that situation and several of the pro-Israel fans left the arena with a police escort.

After the game, the Israelis also received a security escort from the arena, said Paul Rosen, who escorted eight young players from Toronto to Belgrade for the tournament.

Security officials expected there might be trouble at the tournament as a spillover from a recent Under-20 competition in Sofia, Bulgaria, Rosen said. At that event in late December, Yugoslav players used racial insults like "dirty Jew" and "We're going to finish what Hitler started." After Israeli protests to the referee and linesmen fell on deaf ears, the game ended with an on-ice brawl during which the Israelis beat up on their tormentors.

Unlike the situation in Sofia, the incidents in Belgrade originated with fans in the arena and not with the players on the ice, Rosen said.

"You could tell the Yugoslavs did not like Israel," he said. There was a bad feeling in the air. They were upset and we were in their backyard. They knew they could abuse us with impunity."

Riki Goldberg, whose son Jonathan was on the team, said despite the incidents, the situation in Belgrade was an improvement over events in Sofia. The Yugoslav players were better behaved than in Bulgaria and police acted quickly to calm the situation when fans threw firecrackers and a chair at those fans who cheered for Israel, she said.

Goldberg said she made her allegiances clear during the game by waving an Israeli flag and cheering on the team and all she experienced was dirty looks from nearby fans. She left the game early to accompany the two injured boys to hospital, she added.

The crowd seemed to intimidate the referee, Rosen said. After Israel jumped into a 2-0 first period lead, he called a penalty shot (which Rosen said was unwarranted) followed by five penalties in a 3½-minute span.

"It was unbelievable. At that point, all we wanted to do was to get out of the game and vie for the silver medal," he said.

Yugoslavia went on to win 14-2 and cut short Israel's gold medal hope. Going into that game, the boys in blue and white had defeated Turkey 13-0 and Iceland 9-5.

For Jonathan Goldberg, a right winger, the highlight of the game with Yugoslavia was the euphoria he felt after Israel jumped ahead 2-0 and followed that up with a save on the penalty shot. But "when you know the ref is favoring the other team so much, it's hard to get into the game," he said.

Bryant Frydberg, 17, a teammate of Goldberg's with the Thornhill Selects, said, "The refs were very prejudiced against us."

An assistant captain with the Israeli team, Frydberg said "They wouldn't talk to us at all. They said, 'no English.' Versus Yugoslavia, we were up 2-0 and you can't beat the home team in Yugoslavia...The refs were definitely against us."

Frydberg acknowledged, however, that the Yugoslavs were the best team in the tournament. They were all 17, very big and good stickhandlers and skaters, he said.

In their fourth game, Israel and Spain skated to a 3-3 tie, eliminating them from silver medal contention. That game was particularly disappointing for Frydberg, because Spain tied it on a shot he maintains rang off the crossbar, but it was called a goal by the referee and the goal judge.

In their last game against Bulgaria, the Israelis ran out of gas and lost 5-3. Rosen said the team lost two of its best players, Torontonian Erez Eizenman and Israeli Sharon Peret with injuries in the game against Yugoslavia. Neither injury was caused by a Yugoslav player, he said.

Playing with a short bench (although 20 players dressed, Israel relied heavily on two five-man units), with four 14-year-olds in the lineup and for the fifth time in six nights, the Israelis tired early and couldn't keep up with the opposition, Rosen said. They finished the tournament in fourth place out of six teams, behind Yugoslavia, Spain and Bulgaria.

Israel's goalie, Sergei Ostrovski, a Russian oleh, was named the tournament's best netminder, for the second year in a row.

Goldberg, a Grade 12 student at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, had mixed feelings about the event. "It was a lot of fun, but it was disappointing. I think we were the second best team in the tournament and we came in fourth."

Despite the difficult game against Yugoslavia, the boys enjoyed much of their foreign adventure, Rosen said. In Belgrade, they visited the local Holocaust museum, went to the synagogue, met with members of the local community and with the Israeli ambassador.

On the way home, they stopped in Rome and visited the Vatican and the Colosseum.

In addition to Frydberg, Goldberg and Eizenman, other Canadian-Israelis who played in the tournament included Elan Zusman, Victor Vatebski, Gill Brenner, Brad Bloch and Jordan Kadlovsky.

Canadian Jeff Budd, who works as head of volunteers at the ice rink in Metulla, served as the team's manager while Russian oleh Simeon Yacobovitz was the coach.

Rodman now big giver

By TODD WINER
Chicago Jewish News

CHICAGO — Embattled Chicago Bulls star Dennis Rodman has announced he will donate paycheques from 11 games to 11 different charities.

One of the lucky recipients is the Jewish United Fund (JUF) of Metropolitan Chicago, which can be expected to receive in excess of $50,000.

Rodman, best known for his tattoos, pierced body parts and multicolored hair, took the selected charities by surprise, telling the media before officially informing the organizations.

"It was a most welcome surprise," said Steven Nasatir, president of the JUF, the local Jewish federation. "In Jewish tradition, there is a significant emphasis on repentance."

Rodman was suspended by the NBA after kicking a courtside cameraman. He lost some $1.5 million in salary and incentives as a result of the 11-game suspension.

The Inside Back

TECHNICOLOR DREAMIN'

Members of the Charactors Theatre Troup (Travelling Division) in Thornhill bone up for their appearance in Joseph and the Technicolor Dreamcoat, which re-opened in Toronto two weeks ago. The division, made up of 23 children, was chosen to perform the "Entr'acte" and a movement improvisation in the show. Although star Donny Osmond is slated to leave the show after May 25, 1997, Joseph has been extended until August 3, 1997.

Holocaust play honors mums

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO —Mothers were honored in an unusual way in the new production of My Mother's Courage, about a woman who escaped the Holocaust.

The play put on by the Theatre Asylum group includes stories about their mothers by the cast, director and production team, in addition to some excellent, touching poetry and prose about the Holocaust.

The story of how her mother was born in Cherson, between Russia and Poland, in 1944, in wretched conditions in a house, because she was afraid to go to a hospital where no Jewish babies survived, was recounted by assistant director Romy Shiller.

Jennifer Herszman Capraru told of how her grandmother, Fajga Moskowitz, sent her daughter (the director's mother) to hide for four years in Belgian orphanages. "Now I've started using her name [Herszman] sometimes," she writes.

Actor Richard Partington said his mother saved him from drowning at Bournemouth, England, when he was four years old.

Her mother, who was living in England at the time, was married to a missionary. When he developed leprosy in India in 1943, she flew to his side, despite urgings from friends not to do so, writes actor Elizabeth Shepherder.

Actor Tom Barnett praises the courage of his mother in giving up a theatre career to raise a family of five children.

Suffering from a cancerous brain tumor, the mother of actor Lauren McKinley Renzetti fought death so courageously that she survived three days in a coma after life supports were removed. "Her grip on my father's hand never weakened until the very, very, very end."

Actor Margaret Lamarre wrote: "Today, with our freedom to choose, it is an act of courage to accept a pregnancy, not to mention, the process of labor and birth."

CARROT APPLE KUGEL
WE SELL Inglis FOR LESS

4 cups very finely shredded carrots
1/4 cup sugar
1 tsp lemon juice
1/2 cup slivered almonds toasted
1 —1 1/2 cups finely shredded apples
1/2 tsp ground nutmeg
1 tsp grated lemon peel
1/3 — 1/2 cup matzo meal (the amount depends on the liquid produced from the grated carrots and apples - the more liquid the more matzo meal you need.)

Topping: 1/4 cup toasted almonds

Combine all ingredients (except toasted almonds for topping) and mix until thoroughly moistened. If mixture appears too firm add a tablespoon or two of vegetable oil. Transfer mixture to a baking dish of your choice.

Make a topping: ground almonds, or brown sugar & cinnamon sprinkled on top.

Bake at 350°F for 20-30 minutes checking frequently. Remove from oven when it starts turning a light golden brown.

About Seniors

Dear Jesse,
My father died two months ago. My mother is almost 84 years old and wants to continue living in her own home. My brothers and I are nervous about her living alone. We are planning to hire someone to live with her and we will insist that she accept our decision. Are we not justified? We love her very much.

MB

Dear MB,
It is important for you to discuss your wishes with your mother. If she is well enough to live on her own, she is well enough to determine her own living arrangements. Perhaps, if she knows you will rest easier if someone is with her, she might agree to try it. Then, she has the choice of satisfying you or maintaining her privacy. Be diplomatic.

Readers are invited to send any questions they have for Jesse to The CJN. Jesse is the executive director of Jewish Support Services for the Elderly (JSSE) in Montreal.

Matzah, the unleavened bread eaten at Passover, can be enjoyed many ways. One favourite dish, called matzah brei, is a sweet twist on the traditional omelette. Break up matzah and run under warm water to soften. Beat eggs and mix with matzah, honey, cinnamon and salt. Melt butter in a frying pan and cook until golden. Turn over and cook a minute more. Serve as is or with additional honey.

Unrest destabilizes peace

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — The Israeli-Palestinian peace process appears to have sunk deeper into a morass.

Palestinian unrest has spread and Arab states have called for turning back the clock on relations with Israel.

As violent protests against Israel's construction of a new Jewish neighborhood in southeastern Jerusalem entered their second week, clashes between Israeli soldiers and Palestinians erupted in most Palestinian population centres in the West Bank.

Tensions increased last Sunday after a Palestinian student was killed in the unrest and as Israeli security officials braced for the annual observance by Palestinians of Land Day, when protests are held against land expropriations and other Israeli policies.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, spoke of a "virtual collapse of the peace process" and called for a Palestinian commitment to curb violence and crack down on terror.

"We want to see a peace process where terrorism is simply put out of the picture," he said on CBS TV's Face the Nation.

Netanyahu made a similar demand on the Palestinians when he met last week with U.S. special Middle East coordinator Dennis Ross, who also held a separate meeting with Palestinian Authority (PA) leader Yasser Arafat.

Ross returned to Washington to review the discussions with Clinton administration officials.

U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright was expected to visit the region to present a new American initiative aimed at breathing life into the peace process.

The initiative is expected to include the following key points:

• Emphasis will be placed on the war against terror. The PA will be required to take real steps on the ground against terrorist organizations and to tighten security cooperation with Israel. The formation of an American-Israeli-Palestinian special forum on the war against terror is under consideration.

Conversion bill causes stir

North American rabbis react

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Israeli cabinet's decision to bar the legal recognition of Conservative and Reform conversions performed in Israel has caused concern in Canada.

The Israeli cabinet has agreed to a legislative initiative that would require all conversions in Israel to be approved by the Orthodox rabbinical courts.

A direct appeal to Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu to reconsider his "implicit support" of the move was made by Rabbi Dow Marmur of Holy Blossom Temple.

At the same time, the Canadian Council for Reform Judaism said it was opposed to a proposal by a Knesset member to keep the status quo.

Please see related story on page 41.

"The status quo is not the same as it was 50 years ago. There is less tolerance today by Orthodox Jewry in Israel towards other branches of Judaism," said executive director Rabbi Paul Golomb.

Opposition to the ban on non-Orthodox conversions was also expressed by Rabbi Jerome Epstein of New York, executive vice-president of the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism, the association of Conservative congregations in North America.

"We say this is no solution," said Rabbi Einat Ramon of the Conservative/Masorti movement in Israel that opposes the proposal to temporarily restore the status quo, made by a Knesset member on behalf of the government coalition.

"It's just pushing the problem underneath the carpet," Rabbi Ramon said.

The News in Brief

ISRAEL

Doctorate For Hussein

JERUSALEM — Israel's Institute of Technology will award an honorary doctorate degree to King Hussein of Jordan "in recognition of his leadership, contributions and commitment to peace in the Middle East."

The degree will be presented in June. At the same time, the Technion will dedicate a laboratory and an academic chair in the field of water research in memory of the late prime minister Yitzhak Rabin.

WORLD

Bombing Condemned

PARIS — France's Jewish community voiced its sympathy with local Muslims after a crude bomb ripped through a mosque in northeast Paris, slightly injuring its caretaker.

CRIF, France's umbrella group for secular Jewish organizations, said in a statement issued hours after the pre-dawn explosion in the Al-Dawsa Mosque that it "vigorously condemns" the attack and "expresses all of its sympathy to the Muslim community aggrieved by this cowardly act."

Nazi Judgment

CHICAGO — U.S. District Judge David Coar will decide this month whether Bronislaw Hajda, 73, of Schiller Park, Ill., lied to U.S. immigration officials about his alleged service in the Nazi SS during World War II.

If convicted, Hajda, a retired machinist, will lose his U.S. citizenship and could face deportation to his native Poland. Hajda immigrated to the United States in 1950 and became a citizen in 1955.

The U.S. Department of Justice's Office of Special Investigations suspects Hajda of serving as an armed guard at the Treblinka labor camp in Nazi-occupied Poland and participating in the one-day massacre of hundreds of Jews when the camp was liquidated July 23, 1944.

Reconstructionist Rabbis

DEERFIELD BEACH, Fla. — The annual conference of the Reconstructionist Rabbinical Association recently took place with the overall topic Rabbi as educator: envisioning Jewish education for the 21st century.

Sessions focused on creating and implementing personal visions for congregations to meet the changing needs of North American Jews.

Diaspora Students Sought

NEW YORK — Hebrew Union College-Jewish Institute of Religion and the World Union for Progressive Judaism have established the Beit Midrash/A Liberal Yeshiva in Jerusalem.

The program for recent college graduates will address concerns of the modern world, combining traditional Torah study with a liberal, egalitarian spirit.

For more information call 914-949-0312.

Yeltsin Praised

MOSCOW — Russian Jews are praising President Boris Yeltsin for giving Russia's stalled market reforms a decided boost with the appointment of several reform-minded liberals to key posts in his new government.

Yeltsin's decision to appoint Boris Nemtsov, who is Jewish, as first deputy prime minister is seen by many as the most notable change in the cabinet, one that may result in decisive steps to solve Russia's major social and economic ills.

Moscow Rejects Bill

MOSCOW — Russian Jewish leaders and anti-fascist activists are voicing deep concern over the lower house's opposition to a measure to bar fascist propaganda.

The bill was rejected by Communists and ultranationalists, who make up more than half of the Parliament's lower house, known as the Duma.

Some of the measure's opponents described the bill as "Zionist."

ISRAEL DENOUNCES UN'S CENSURE VOTE

Israel denounced as slanderous and invalid a resolution passed last week by the United Nations' Human Rights Commission charging the Jewish state with "war crimes and an affront to humanity" in its administration of the captured Arab territories.

The resolution also demanded that Israel restore what it called the human, religious and property rights of the residents of the territories and asserted that Israeli settlements in or annexations of the territories were forbidden.

ONTARIO WILL SUBSIDIZE BAYCREST'S RESIDENTS

Nearly 300 residents at Baycrest Home for the Aged in Toronto are going to receive substantial benefits under Ontario's extended medicare scheme, effective April 1. There are 374 beds at the home.

The government plans to pay $9 a day for all Baycrest residents who require a large enough degree of nursing care to qualify for the plan. The patient must pay additional charges above $9.

It is estimated the cost to the government will be approximately $2,500 a day.

When making a donation for all occasions, please remember
The Israel Museum and Yad Sarah.
Charitable Tax Receipts will be issued.

Relations deteriorate between Jewish, Arab student groups

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jewish students at the University of Toronto are becoming increasingly fed up with Arab student groups over what they see as a continued hard line towards Israel, lack of sensitivity to Jewish concerns and repeated rebuffs at efforts to foster better relations. Nevertheless, the Jewish Students Union (JSU) will continue to reach out to Arab students and attempt to "build a relationship," said JSU program director Lance Davis.

Scuffle at Palestine House

See page 7

A different approach was adopted by students from the Betar-Tagar movement, who last week picketed a speaking engagement featuring former U.S. Congressman Paul Findley, an outspoken critic of Israel.

The Jewish student group titled their protest "Palestinian terror bombing is a human rights violation" in response to Findley's topic of discussion, "Life after the Oslo Accords; are the rights of Palestinians being respected."

Pini Ravid, director of Betar-Tagar, which is affiliated with Likud Canada, said the protest was in response to the suicide bombing in Tel Aviv and was an attempt to shift the focus from Israel-bashing to the Palestinian perpetrators of atrocities.

While about a dozen Betar-Tagar students demonstrated peacefully outside the lecture theatre, 200 students gathered inside the Medical Science auditorium. The overwhelming majority identified with the Palestinian movement, many wearing kefiyehs and other Arab clothing, said Davis, who along with a few other JSU students, monitored the lecture. "It was a lot of anti-Zionist propaganda," he said. "It wasn't a conciliatory crowd. My feeling was that no one wanted to bend at all."

Although the protest was organized by a right wing student group, other students at the Jewish Students Union have recently expressed exasperation at what they consider provocative and insensitive Arab programming.

At a recent Arab Culture Week, a highly politicized display presented by a Palestinian student group at a prominent location attacked Israel. The text in part of the display stated "the SS were responsible for the majority of German war atrocities, comparable to those committed by the Zionists." The JSU, believing the display contained hate literature, complained to campus police, but no charges were laid

At a recent storytelling event which included storytellers from the Celtic, Jewish, Arab and native groups, only the Arab storyteller told a highly political story that explicitly attacked Israel.

And at least three times, Arab student groups have pulled out of joint Jewish/Arab programs at the last minute, forcing cancellation of the event, Davis said.

The result has been increasing frustration among Jewish students and a growing attitude against re-

Our 'precious stones' are beyond price

At the end of this month, our children at college, university and other post-secondary school places of study will be in the middle of a torturous, two-week test of endurance called exams. Regardless of the school, the course of study or the year of study, the pressure on them will be severe. Exams, though unpleasant, sometimes extremely so, are an unavoidable part of the experience.

In the manner so customary to parents, we reach for a penetrating, if convenient piece of wisdom to share with our children. We tell them, unconvincingly, the experience of exams may indeed stand them in good stead in later years. The stress of exams, we advise rather implausibly and without looking directly into their anxious faces, is merely part of the stress of life. And in any event, they have no choice but to write them.

Even with exams, however, we know that this period in their young lives in the "open," intellectually challenging and socially engaging environment of college or university will be memorable.

Our children are charting their own personal "life" courses.

They are staking out the foundation of a career path, though that path will constantly evolve in the unfolding fullness of time.

They are forming new friendships and new relationships, many of them to last a lifetime.

They are accommodating new ideas and concepts.

They are confirming and affirming old ideas and concepts.

They are contending with people — students and professors — whose causes and slogans may be anathema if not even threatening.

They are refining the unfinished clay of themselves into the intellectual, cultural, social and spiritual shapes by which the world will know them and, more importantly, by which they, ultimately, will know themselves.

No matter how loving and supportive the parents' home, the post-secondary school period of our children's lives is critically important — like a kiln hardening into final form the confidences, the doubts, the discoveries and the many causes that contending forces have fashioned into self-asserting, individualistic, human shape.

As Jewish parents, we hope and pray that our children will cherish and adopt into their own lives, the values, customs and traditions of Judaism.

But what do we do — as individuals and as a community — to give our children, and thus us too, the best chance that they will in fact "cherish and adopt into their own lives, the values, customs and traditions of Judaism?"

At this critically important stage in their lives, do our children have the benefit on campus of positive Jewish influences, of inspiring Jewish role models, of meeting places where they can come together with their peers to discuss, argue, debate, or sing, or dance?

It is against this backdrop that I wish to excerpt for the reader portions of an article which recently appeared in the Jewish Week. It was written by Josh Rolnick. The author, self-described as a generation-Xer, was born in 1970. In the article, he attempts to explain why Israel does not mean the same to him as it does to his father.

I bring the excerpt as an illustration of how the college/university period in our children's lives is so instrumental in forming their adult futures, and, for the purpose of this column, their Jewish futures.

I do not comment on the substance of Rolnick's views of Israel. Nor do I equate one's "affiliation" to Israel with the extent of one's affiliation to their Judaism and to the Jewish people, although they are certainly interconnected.

I bring the excerpt to plead that Jewish parents must make available for our children every possible means at this searching time in their lives, to discover the splendor and the richness of our Jewish way of life and of our values.

"Many in my generation...view Israel through a very different lens.

"According to the Council of Jewish Federations' 1990 Jewish Population study...only 25 percent of Jews ages 25 to 34 say they are very or extremely attached to Israel compared to 44 percent of Jews ages 55 to 64. There are at least two important reasons why this is so.

"The first has to do with memory...Our feeling that Jews need their own state comes from our reading of history, not our footsteps through it. Without an impending threat to Jews, the imperative for Israel is less clear.

"The second reason for my generation's distance from Israel has to do with the rise of secularism.

"The average 20-something Jew today lacks a religious connection to Israel, and thus a natural link to Jerusalem's soil."

As Rolnick himself proves in reference to his attitude to Israel, the generation born after the Six Day War, especially in North America, has grown up with different formative influences and different experiences from ours, that have shaped their Jewish outlooks.

We cannot assume, and we must do more than merely hope, that our children will automatically grasp tightly to the ways of their forebears. We must take steps.

It is generally true to say, that we would spare no expense to protect, to take care of, to insure the well-being of our expensive jewels and precious stones.

How much more precious are our children to us than our most precious stone? How much more invaluable are they than the most expensive of all jewels?

But what steps do we take to to protect them, to take care of their Jewish development on campus, during this pivotal but highly "vulnerable" point in their young developing lives.

Despite the generosity of an increasingly taxed and perennially overburdened Jewish federation budget, and despite the loyalty, creativity and self-sacrifice of the small group of professionals running from one campus to the other as their counsellors, leaders, programmers and friends, the 15,000 Jewish college and university students in the Greater Toronto Area are woefully and precariously under-serviced.

In sad contrast, therefore, unlike the expenses we do not spare to insure our precious stones, we spare almost every expense, to "insure" the Jewish wellbeing of our children on campus.

In the next column, I will describe the nature and extent of current campus services available to college and university students, compare those services with similarly-sized communities of students, and explore the possibilities that must be taken, if we are not to risk "losing" them, our children, at this critical crossroads in their lives.

New commission to lobby govt. on war criminals

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — B'nai Brith Canada and the Simon Wiesenthal Centre have joined forces to create a commission designed to keep the pressure on government to bring Nazi war criminals to justice.

Members of the commission, consisting of senior officials from the two organizations, met recently with Justice Minister Allan Rock to present him with a series of legal recommendations and to urge further action on the war crimes front before time runs out. The recommendations call for changes to the Criminal Code to make prosecutions easier, harmonization of the Immigration and Citizenship Acts to expedite proceedings against suspects and a call to investigate and prosecute members of a Waffen SS division who engaged in mass slaughter of Jews and Poles.

"Ten years after the release of the Deschenes Commission report [on Nazi war criminals], Canada's record in bringing to justice Nazi war criminals remains dismal," said Lyle Smordin, national president of B'nai Brith Canada. "With time quickly running out, it is imperative that the Jewish community work together to ensure that mass murderers are held accountable for their actions."

Sol Littman, Canadian representative of the Wiesenthal Centre, said 2,000 members of the SS division who were admitted into Canada in 1950 have been ignored by the government. "These 2,000 constitute the largest pool of hitherto uninvestigated alleged war criminals in Canada," he said.

The announcement came several weeks after CBS' 60 Minutes and Dateline NBC aired reports that focused on alleged Nazis in Canada.

Lisa Armony, director of B'nai Brith's Institute for International Affairs, said the impetus for creation of the commission "started with the attention given the [issue] by the American media. We sensed a momentum, a pressure had been created.

"We felt it was time for a united effort on this issue," she said, adding that the Simon Wiesenthal Centre agreed to B'nai Brith's overtures to create the commission. It is composed of Jewish community leaders and legal and academic experts. Its mandate is to devise practical, effective measures to bring to justice Nazi war criminals.

In addition to meeting with Rock, the commission hopes to meet with Solicitor General Herb Gray and Immigration Minister Lucienne Robillard as well as members of the opposition, to create "support from across the political spectrum," Armony said.

In its recommendations, the commission called on the government:

- to explain publicly the moral and legal imperatives behind taking legal steps against war crimes suspects;
- to go beyond the12 cases authorities say they will have begun by the end of March and to continue prosecuting suspects "as long as there is useful investigative work to be done;"
- to increase resources allocated to the issue;
- to cross check Canadian pension lists and other lists with lists of suspects prepared by war crimes investigators in Germany, in the United States and with the United Nations;
- to amend Canadian citizenship and criminal law legislation to permit effective and quick legal remedies against suspects.

Conversion bill stir

The matter is high on the agenda of major fundraising groups meeting in New York. Some have expressed the view that the cabinet's move will hurt campaigns by the United Jewish Appeal.

"Israel is operating as if the Diaspora doesn't exist," said Rabbi Golomb.

Whether the amendment gets sent to the Knesset before the Parliament breaks next week for Passover depends on the outcome of a flurry of negotiations taking place between politicians and Reform and Conservative representatives.

"The Orthodox community is united as never before on the issue advocating the passing of the conversion law by the Knesset," said Dr. Mandell Ganchrow, president of the Orthodox Union, in New York.

Non-Orthodox conversions of Diaspora Jews performed outside Israel are now legally recognized in Israel. Netanyahu has pledged not to change their status.

The legislative action reinforcing exclusive Orthodox control over conversions was demanded by the haredi parties as a condition of their joining the coalition of the Netanyahu government.

Reform and Conservative conversions have been performed in Israel for years, but have not been legally recognized. The Supreme Court said in 1995 that there was no legal reason for barring that recognition for civil purposes.

That ruling increased the determination of the Orthodox parties to pass legislation eliminating such recognition.

But the Orthodox coalition partners voted against the proposal put forward by the cabinet last week, because they see it as too narrow. They want a law that also bans conversions performed abroad of Israelis who prepare for their conversions in Israel.

Rabbi Marmur sent a plea to cabinet member Natan Sharansky to speak out against the ban on Conservative and Reform conversions.

Since Sharansky represents Russian immigrants, many of whom are "halachically disabled," he should be standing up for their rights, Rabbi Marmur said.

All Reform congregations in Canada were asked to send protests to the Israeli government as soon as word of the ban reached here, said Rabbi Golomb.

Silver lining seen in Har Choma controversy

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Israel's widely criticized decision to build Har Choma, a neighborhood in East Jerusalem, may ironically reinvigorate the peace process, a leading Israeli analyst suggests.

Characterizing the tension over Har Choma as another crisis on the long road toward peace rather than one which threatens its very foundations, Zeev Maoz said its effects may be two-fold.

To compensate the Palestinians for Har Choma, Israel may take no further unilateral steps in Jerusalem. As well, Israel's second major withdrawal from the West Bank, slated for the autumn, may be more generous than the first planned redeployment (which was scheduled to have been carried out several weeks ago, but which has since been postponed).

Maoz, head of the Jaffee Centre for Strategic Studies at Tel Aviv University, suggested that these possible scenarios could be devices for pumping new life into the peace process. He made his comments a day before the latest Hamas suicide bombing in Israel on March 21.

Here to attend a conference sponsored by the International Studies Association, Maoz said that Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu should have consulted the Palestinian Authority and Jordan before unilaterally deciding to proceed with Har Choma. But Maoz also took the Palestinians to task for "mishandling the Jerusalem issue."

Maoz, in an interview, called Har Choma a violation in spirit of the Oslo accords. "It contaminates the political climate, causes unnecessary tension and does not lead to mutual trust. But it should be understood that Netanyahu is operating under domestic constraints."

In principle, he added, "Israel should decide for itself whether it wants to build in East Jerusalem."

Yet Israel and the Palestinians will find it increasingly difficult to address other momentous issues if they put too much emphasis on Jerusalem.

It is in Israel's interest to leave Jerusalem to final status talks, he said.

Maoz, who succeeded the late general Aharon Yariv as head of the Jaffee Centre in 1994, said that Netanyahu may well end up relinquishing between 50 percent and 90 percent of the West Bank when Israel completes the last of its three redeployments in the summer of 1998.

Maoz, the former chair of Haifa University's political science department, observed that the withdrawals will lay the groundwork for the emergence of a Palestinian state in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. He said the majority of Israelis regard such a state as a solution to the Arab-Israeli conflict.

Turning to Israel's stalled negotiations with Syria, Maoz warned that the Syrians could initiate hostilities in the not too distant future if the present impasse remains unbroken.

Syria would launch a war to break the current political logjam and to revive the peace process, he explained, noting the parallels between today and the 1973 Yom Kippur War.

"Syria's aim would be to shake Israel's hold on the Golan Heights. It's a highly unlikely scenario, but I'm afraid the Syrians are growing desperate as time goes on and nothing happens on the Golan front."

In his view, "a war with Syria would not be a war of national consensus." As he put it: "A growing number of Israelis are convinced that Netanyahu is not doing enough to revive the peace process with Syria."

A condition for a resumption of Israel's bilateral negotiations with Syria would be an explicit statement by Netanyahu that he recognizes the land-for-peace formula with respect to the Golan, he said.

Syria's leader, Hafez al-Assad, wants to be certain that such talks do not break down and, in fact, lead to concrete results.

"Anyone who's looked at Syria's position knows there can't be an agreement without a complete [Israeli] withdrawal," he said.

He believes that Assad would probably agree to leave certain disagreements, notably the depth of a pullback, to international arbitration.

"Netanyahu understands he can't have a settlement without a full withdrawal. But if he thinks he can get away with a no-war, no-peace situation, he may be content with the status quo."

Maoz disagrees with observers who argue that Assad is merely interested in the process rather than the outcome of negotiations. Assad, he said, has made a "strategic decision" to make peace with Israel, provided the terms are to his satisfaction.

Wading into the debate on Israel's military presence in southern Lebanon, Maoz cautioned Israel against a unilateral pullout without a prior agreement with Syria regarding the Golan.

He warned that Jordan may cool off its relations with Israel in the absence of what he described as "a peace dividend." So far, none has materialized. King Hussein balances the peace treaty with domestic opposition to it.

According to Maoz, Israel's relationship with Egypt is dependent on the state of Israel's ties with Syria and the Palestinians. In the short run, Israel's "cold peace" with Egypt will continue, but will gradually thaw as the peace process warms up and "we learn to understand each other's sensitivities."

In the meantime, Maoz takes solace from a recent development. "There is a growing awareness among Egyptian intellectuals of the need for dialogue with Israelis."

Scuffle breaks out at Palestine House demonstration

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

MISSISSAUGA — Police were called to defuse tensions during a protest demonstration outside Palestine House on March 21, the day of the Tel Aviv cafe bombing in which three women were killed. No charges were laid, but demonstrators were made to leave the building's parking lot, which is private property.

The hastily organized delegation of about a dozen protesters from Tagar (the student branch of Herut-Likud) and other right-wing Zionist organizations was met with verbal abuse, claimed Pini Ravid, Toronto-based Betar-Tagar shaliach.

According to Ravid, the protesters (none of whom were from Mississauga) were accosted by two men from Palestine House who "screamed" at them, called them names and told them to "go back to Israel." He added that "30 to 40 Arabs came from the back door with sticks in their hands" before the police arrived.

The protesters carried Israeli flags and signs bearing slogans such as "Israel Builds, the Palestinians Kill" and "Palestinian Authority and Hamas: Can You Tell the Difference?"

The demonstration was over within half an hour, after police had been summoned by both sides.

"We basically came to a peaceful demonstration," maintains Ravid. "We just came to make a point."

Rashad Saleh, chairman of Palestine House, claimed he initially tried to reason with protesters, asking them to move off the parking lot onto the sidewalk or the street. He admitted pushing an elderly protester "all the way to the street" but denied allegations he had hurt the man.

"There was a shoving incident," confirmed Constable George Koekkoek of Peel Regional Police's Erin Mills Station. Koekkoek, who responded to the call and wrote the police report, said there "was no complaint of anybody being hurt that I recall." He said Saleh "was using as much force as necessary to get them off his property.

The two-storey building on Erindale Station Road is owned entirely by Palestine House, he said.

A protester who wished to remain anonymous said he witnessed the altercation. The older demonstrator was punched in the chest, he said. "We were both pushed into the roadway where traffic was."

He participated because he "felt very strongly that Israel building homes, even on land under dispute, doesn't warrant children and women being blown up."

Saleh, who has cordial relations with a number of Jewish groups, pointed out that he doesn't demonstrate in front of the Jewish Community Centre. He suggested an Ottawa embassy would be a more appropriate spot for a protest. "If they want to express their views, send me a message and I'll be glad to relay it," he told The CJN.

Larry Zeifman, co-chair of One Israel (the Canadian representative of the settlement movement), defended the idea of a protest. Although he himself was not at the demonstration, his group was involved in initiating the idea.

"It was very appropriate that the Toronto community demonstrate against terror," he said, adding that a demonstration would reach a wider audience than a private meeting.

"Yes we could have talked to them....It didn't mean [protesters] had to be met with bats or assault. For people who claim to be our peace partners, it's outrageous."

Palestine House "represents the Palestinian interests in Toronto," said Ravid. "There is a Palestinian flag. Obviously it's the right place to go."

Saleh said Palestine House, which offers English as a Second Language classes among other activities, "has nothing to do with what's going on in the Middle East."

That same day, Saleh was signatory to a press release condemning the Tel Aviv bombing and offering condolences to the families of the victims. In it he sharply criticized Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's "macho approach and arrogance [which] will bring the Israelis and the Palestinians nothing but further violence and suffering. Land confiscation, bulldozers and constructing new homes at the expense of the Palestinians will definitely result in the rise of desperation, aggression and terrorism.

"Collective punishment is not the answer to what happened today. Level headedness, restraint, respect and understanding will surely uproot terrorism and its perpetrators," he concluded.

The response to Tagar's demonstration "didn't show condemnation at all," said Ravid.

Dry Bones
THE RABIN GOVERNMENT SURRENDERED TERRITORY TO THE PLO...

BUT BIBI HAS SKILLFULLY MANAGED TO DO THE SAME THING...
... IN RETURN FOR NO HOPE AT ALL!

Metaphysical fulcrum

With each additional invective he casts against Israel, Yasser Arafat injures his own people more and more. The farther away he pushes himself from the negotiating table, the greater the distance he puts between his people's wretched reality and their nationalistic aspirations.

But he persists. He fans war-like flames. And he incites hate-filled violence. Last weekend, for example, at a meeting of the Arab League, Arafat accused Israel of "waging war against a defenceless people." Earlier, he told reporters Palestinians were against the "Judaization of Jerusalem." (Our emphasis.)

As a result, the air thick with incendiary sparks, rioting continues in Hebron and in Bethlehem. As of this writing, one Palestinian has lost his life. Scores of others have been injured. Who knows how many more will die, how many more will be hurt, before their leader douses the fire that he stokes?

Arafat has decided, for the time being, not to pursue further talks with Israel"as long as the expansion of settlements is continuing." By "settlements", of course, he means Har Choma.

But if Arafat is persistent, he is also sly. He constantly refers to the proposed housing project on Har Choma as a "settlement." He knows through experience that the western media will likely adopt his terminology and with it, the false notion that housing in Jerusalem is illegal.

More insidious is his dismissive, pejorative reference to the "Judaization of Jerusalem." Here too, he knows he has a receptive audience throughout the western world and in the media.

But to the Jewish people, the very terminology is offensive, not to mention the sneering, contemptuous way in which he spits it out.

The Judaization of Jerusalem, literally and metaphorically, is precisely the mission of the modern Jewish return to the ancient Jewish homeland. It is the metaphysical fulcrum on which the weight of that "return" is balanced. We must resist by all turns, Arafat's efforts to destroy that balance.

Conscience stirring

It appears that conscience may be stirring in France. Last week, more than 35,000 marched in the streets of Strasbourg outside the conference hall where the National Front party and its leader, Jean Marie Le Pen, were convening.

Le Pen's ideology is notorious: a right-wing, intolerant, xenophobic approach to life in France, opposed to anyone who does not look or sound like he does.

The anti-Le Pen rally was impressive in its size, its fervor, and the breadth of its coalition. But it is only a beginning. It cannot be considered an achievement in and of itself. Recent media reports claim that as many as 15 percent of French voters may support the National Front. This is a sizable number. It is more than a fringe.

Thus, it is our profound hope that the forces that united against Le Pen last weekend remain united and ever vigilant in their opposition to him and to all that he represents.

The lesson we in Canada can learn from the Strasbourg march is plain. We must also be vocal in our opposition to anyone or to any party that attempts to prey upon the vulnerable and the "different" among us. As one of the marchers aptly said: "First, second, third generation. We are all the children of immigrants."

Who, better than the Jewish people, can understand the profound truth of this simple statement?

THE FIRST ZIONIST CONFERENCE, BASEL 1897

"If we assume there are nine million Jews in the world, and that it would be possible to colonize ten thousand Jews in Palestine every year, the Jewish question would require nine hundred years for its solution. This would seem impracticable."

(From Herzl's opening address to the Congress)

This Week in Canadian Jewish History

March 31, 1899 the local press of Saint John, N.B., reported the arrival of the S.S. Gallia from Liverpool with 300 Jewish immigrants on board. (Canadian Jewish Congress Archives)

Don't abandon heartland of Israel

In the pursuit of a democratic and Jewish State of Israel, Rabbi Shlomo Jakobovits was reported ("Arab state needed as result of demographic changes: rabbi," CJN, March 13), to have made three points in favor of the Israeli abandonment of Judea, Samaria and Gaza: demography, strategy and Judaism.

The "demographic argument" notes that the Arab population in Israel has a greater rate of natural increase than does the Jewish population. It would follow that the Arabs would eventually outnumber the Jews. Therefore the Jews are advised to retreat to the confines of pre-1967 Israel, more or less.

But there is a large Arab population living within the borders of "Little Israel." Prior to the recent Russian immigration, the Arabs within Israel would have achieved a majority in about 50 years, as opposed to 20 years with the inclusion of Judea, Samaria and Gaza. Retreat only delays an Arab demographic victory. Rabbi Jakobovits understands this.

You report that Rabbi Jakobovits said the Arab population under Israeli control must not be allowed to increase. In what way does abandoning most of the heartland of historic Israel preserve the democratic nature of the State of Israel if a discriminatory policy is still necessary to preserve the Jewish majority?

The "strategic argument" in favor of retreat is that modern wars are fought with missiles carrying nuclear warheads and that territory is irrelevant. But all modern wars to date have been decided by conventional ground forces. The loss of control of the Golan and the highlands of Judea and Samaria obviously weakens Israel's conventional military options. Also, deterrent forces need space in which to hide from a pre-emptive attack. Absent a territorial buffer, the Israeli government must commit to a strategy of pre-emptive attack, as it did prior to June 1967. This is a destabilizing option and a horrifying prospect in the presence of weapons of mass destruction. The vulnerability of Israel to attack by such weapons is heightened by the great concentration of the population in a small number of cities.

A rational response to the threat of nuclear attack is to disperse the population as much as possible in small settlements in hilly terrain, so that it would not be possible to destroy a large proportion of the Jewish population with only a few explosions. Israel should be moving as much of its population as possible into towns and villages in the uplands of Judea, Samaria and the Galilee.

There seems to be an assumption that retreat will lead to peaceful relations with the Arabs. If that is so, Israel would be well advised to disarm entirely, thereby freeing herself of a crippling economic burden. But, of course, no one really thinks that there are no risks of war after a retreat. The open and vile anti-Semitism of the Arab press is just a small sign of endemic hatred of Israel and Jews among Arab intellectuals and the Arab population in general.

It would be unseemly to dispute with Rabbi Jakobovits on the Jewish religious rationale in favor of retreat. An answer depends on what one thinks the facts are. Nevertheless, with Purim not long past, it's relevant to remember that Mordecai refused to bow before Haman, in spite of the danger of inciting Haman's hatred.

Another view on mohalim

Rabbi Moshe Stern recently wrote to The CJN (March 13), and suggested that unless a mohel is certified by the Vaad Harabonim, he is not observant or committed to Torah.

I would remind our community that we have many mohalim among us who are also members of the medical profession and are indeed committed to Torah.

I am aware of Rabbi Stern's very significant contribution to our community, but would suggest that the distinguished rabbi's pen would be better served repairing fences and not tearing them down.

Jews in Colombia don't face anti-Semitism

I am writing in response to the article "Hispanic Publisher a Success" (CJN, March 13).

As a Jew born in Bogota, Colombia, 31 years ago, raised in an openly loving Jewish family as part of an openly Jewish community, I must take issue with most of Eduardo Uruena's statements, and, on behalf of Colombia's Jewish community, set the record straight. Uruena's comments unfairly characterize Colombia as a stereotypical anti-Semitic society, which it is not.

It is important that your readers know that growing up in Bogota, I attended the Jewish school, Colegio Colombo Hebreo, which was founded more than 40 years ago. As a matter of fact, every major city with a Jewish community has a Jewish school. Thus, Uruena's comment that he attended a Catholic school because "there were no others" is incorrect.

Contrary to Uruena's comments, my family, indeed my community, never had to hide our roots and Jewish practices. I went to one of the three synagogues every Shabbat and lit my Shabbat candles openly. We never felt we had to keep our Jewishness a secret, and never faced "a lot of bigotry." We never kept anything secret.

The anti-Semitism described by Uruena did once exist (before World War II). Nevertheless, the Jewish community was able to get established in Colombia where it thrived. Colombia maintains diplomatic relations with Israel and the Israeli Embassy was founded in Colombia in 1960. Since then, anti-Semitism has diminished dramatically,and, although still present, is almost imperceptible.

Arafat's political strategy

The silence that deafens

By GERALD M. STEINBERG
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

First in importance come actions, then — particularly in the Middle East — words. And in the face of terrorism, silence too speaks volumes.

Three-and-a-half years have passed since Oslo, but Yasser Arafat has consistently failed to condemn terrorism clearly and unequivocally.

After the latest atrocity in Tel Aviv, instead of using his status as elected head of the Palestinian Authority to take a strong stand against violence, he ran away again.

Arafat's behavior contrasts sharply with Yitzhak Rabin's, and with that of King Hussein.

In 1994, Rabin did not hide his anger after Baruch Goldstein killed 29 Palestinians in Hebron. He could have excused the murders as the desperate act of a doctor who had seen too many victims of terror die in his hands.

Instead, Rabin told the Israeli public, "I am shamed by the disgrace imposed upon us by a degenerate murderer."

In repeated statements, he declared that the "damage inflicted by one person on the State of Israel, on the Jewish people and on the people of Israel" was immeasurable. He made no attempt to shift the blame. "This is an Israeli responsibility, because we are the government," he declared.

Rabin was not alone in his unequivocal condemnation.

Benjamin Netanyahu, who headed the opposition, denounced the "despicable crime" that had violated Jewish and universal values and could be neither tolerated nor excused.

President Ezer Weizman declared: "There is no understanding, no forgiveness and no atonement for this horrible act," while Shimon Peres warned that Israel "will be in grave trouble if we do not mobilize" to fight terrorism and its supporters.

"We can have no peace with them, and no accommodation. These people can cause a catastrophe. They are the enemies of the nation," Peres added.

Two weeks ago, after a Jordanian soldier killed seven Israeli schoolgirls, King Hussein did not hide his anger and shame. In appointing a commission of inquiry, he wrote "I am sure you share with me...and all members of the honorable Arab army's armed forces, the feelings of pain, shock and shame over the vile crime...by the bullet of a treacherous coward, who has harmed the noble reputation of our army and its honor."

Instead of blaming others, dismissing these murders as the act of a deranged individual, or running away, the Jordanian leader immediately returned from Europe.

A few days later, he took the unprecedented step of going to Bet Shemesh to console the victims' families.

Accompanied by two of his children, by members of the government and the Jordanian press, Hussein got down on his knees and declared, "Words cannot express how I personally feel, how my family feels, how my people feel. We consider this a loss that all of us suffered...I feel that if there is anything in life, it is to ensure that all the children enjoy peace and security. I hope you consider me a brother and a member of the family."

Beyond the immense moral impact, these words and gestures of empathy with the victims helped heal political wounds and restore confidence between Israel and Jordan.

Denouncing despicable crimes

If Arafat and other Palestinian leaders were seriously interested in the peace process and in ending the long and painful conflict, wouldn't they have taken a cue from their partners?

But instead of taking the high road, Arafat persists in peppering his public speeches with calls for jihad, armed struggle and praise for terrorist "martyrs" like Yihye Ayyash.

Arafat's links to continuing terrorism and murder extend to actions like letting terrorists out of Palestinian jails and holding meetings and making agreements with Hamas leaders.

Arafat's encouragement of terror for political ends, and his failure to take a clear and consistent public stand against violence make a mockery of the peace process.

Israel is asked to take security risks for the sake of peace, to open airports and roads ("safe passages") and to allow thousands of Palestinians to work in its cities, without any quid pro quo from Arafat.

In the critical area of Arafat confronting terrorism, the peace process has yet to begin.

The 'amber light' that killed

By MOSHE ZAK
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright, talking privately with members of Congress, reportedly said that faced with the current crisis with the Palestinians, Benjamin Netanyahu should set up a national unity government. Very likely someone passed Albright's view onto Jerusalem.

Netanyahu appeared in no hurry to act on this advice, but the U.S. administration unwittingly helped create national unity elsewhere — in the Palestinian camp.

Yasser Arafat's reception in the White House and his meetings in the State Department earlier this month led him to believe he could risk uniting the Palestinian rank and file with Oslo's Islamic opponents, who are for continuing the "armed struggle."

Arafat sensed he had the administration's respect and saw it as even willing to sanction "unusual" measures aimed at allowing the Gazan in the street to let off steam. The United States assumed, wrongly, that Palestinian anger could be vented via protest, obviating terror. Hence its raising no objection to Arafat's international conference in Gaza.

However, Arafat then interpreted what the Americans told him in a way radically different from what they had intended. When he got back from Washington, he met with the leaders of Hamas, Islamic Jihad and other opposition groups, and indicated they could "let off steam" via terror.

The Palestinian Authority's threats of force against the bulldozers on Har Choma, and Arafat's successes in the international offensive against the construction actually helped escalate the violence.

Getting this "amber light," Palestinians took to the streets of Hebron and Bethlehem, stoning and firebombing IDF soldiers. Ibrahim Makadmeh, the Hamas leader newly released from Arafat's jail, screamed out to Gaza crowds of forthcoming attacks inside Israel — at just around the time his emissary was choosing his table in Tel Aviv's Apropo cafe.

With Palestinian popular support for Hamas operations arousing envy within Arafat's Fatah, the spiral of terror will widen.

The United States believed it could cool things down by appeasing Arafat, ignoring intelligence reports about his encouraging terror, and by publicly calling on Israel to halt the bulldozers on Har Choma.

Its mistake was seeing Har Choma as the pivot of the crisis and assuming that an Arafat-Netanyahu meeting would calm things down.

It didn't realize that the problem lay in the date of March 17, when final status talks were scheduled to resume. And it didn't think how Oslo had simply swept under the rug the huge gap between the sides on Jerusalem, the right of return and the permanent status of the territories.

While some Israelis hoped that the interim period would engender an atmosphere that would make the Palestinians more conciliatory over Jerusalem, the Palestinians doubted it. They knew exactly where Jerusalem figured in their plans.

When the date for final status negotiations approached, the "battle for Jerusalem" drew nearer and direct terror lurked in the background. But then the timetable of Israeli withdrawals became modified and Arafat thought he could activate terror by "remote control."

But he is gradually losing control of the situation, carried along on the crest of the wave of popular protest he started and pushed by international conferences to break off relations with Israel even before he gets more territory.

The possibility of a real crisis panicked the Americans into sending special envoy Dennis Ross to Rabat in Morocco to persuade Arafat to meet with Netanyahu and thus ease tension.

But since the present crisis was not caused by Har Choma but by Arafat's desire to bring the Jerusalem issue to the fore, the package deal Ross is bringing to the region is like a tranquilizer after a heart attack.

Some Israelis thought Jerusalem could be spun out for two more years, until the end of final status negotiations, but Arafat's provocative speeches at the Islamic conference showed otherwise. He wanted Jerusalem discussed, and he wanted it discussed amid threats and violence.

Crisis not caused by Har Choma

It is no accident that the violent student-IDF clashes erupted in Bethlehem, just south of Jerusalem, and in Ramallah, just north of it.

Arafat is using the road to Jerusalem to mold the Arab consensus, while trying to split the Israeli one.

Israel and the United States must tell him that this manoeuvre won't work, that he cannot twist our arm on Jerusalem.

The writer, a veteran journalist, comments on current affairs.

Protests against Israel's decision to build a new housing project on Har Choma have continued now for three weeks. Included among the protesters are the Palestinian police whose responsibility it was to contain the protest in the first place. [Reuters/RNS]

Helping students keep in touch

By VIVA PRESS

As final exams approach, it's time to reflect on the impact of the Atlantic Provinces Jewish Students Federation (APJSF) during the past year.

By Viva Press in Halifax

The APJSF reaches out to Jewish students throughout the Atlantic provinces. It is the centralizing body of Jewish students who are in small minorities at the dozen or so colleges and universities in this area. It is the only Jewish organization here and it is responsible for communication between the different universities.

From the start of the school year in September with Schmooze & Booze part one, to the breaking of the Yom Kippur fast, to the third-annual ski trip, to Shabbat dinners, to Schmooze & Booze part shtayim, to our Purim party in March, the APJSF has enjoyed a fun-packed year.

The last two programs of the academic year are happening later this month. On April 6, elections for next year's executive positions will take place, followed by a bagel brunch. And during Pesach, there will be a student seder.

The new executive for the upcoming year, with the help of program coordinator Yakov Feig, will be responsible for organizing next year's events. Communication between the Jewish students at the different universities will be the number 1 priority.

The vote is being conducted all over the area. Members of each of the following universities will vote for president, communications chair and other campus representatives: Dalhousie, University of King's College, Acadia, University of New Brunswick, University of Moncton, University of Prince Edward Island, University College of Cape Breton, Mount Allison, Nova Scotia College of Art and Design, and Memorial.

Schmooze & Booze, part shtayim

In addition to the events the APJSF has organized, it has also been invited to numerous Atlantic Jewish Council programs.

At the biannual convention in December, guest speaker, Julius Ciss, spoke about how to counter missionaries who are out to convert Jews and how Halifax can deal with this threat.

In fact, it's just as well Ciss came to talk about this important topic. During the second week of March, two of my peers confronted a man on Spring Garden Road, a main street in Halifax. He was handing out Jews for Jesus pamphlets. After one of them told the man that he worked at the Atlantic Jewish Council, the man left. Fortunately, this was the only encounter reported.

The APJSF was also able to schedule in a special talk last month with Chen Ivri, counsellor of the Israel Embassy in Ottawa. Ivri spoke about Israel's position in the peace process. Because the talk was set up at the Dalhousie campus, students were able to ask questions in an informal atmosphere. Ivri was visiting the Jewish communities in the area and held student discussions at both Dalhousie and University of New Brunswick.

With the good turnout for events this year, the APJSF has seen a splinter group emerge. Jewish students above the age of 24 and young adults outside of university have created their own group. The new group is called the Association of Young Jewish Adults in Atlantic Canada (AYJAAC). They hold their own weekly meetings and organize some of their own programs, but they still retain an affiliation with the APJSF.

Although the APJSF does most of its programming during the school year, it doesn't stop there. For the students who remain in Halifax and the other university towns, the APJSF organizes summer retreats in various parts of the Atlantic provinces. This summer will be no exception.

I know that the APJSF isn't the only group organizing Jewish events for its students. I'm sure other student federations around the country have had good years too. And that's what unites us. No matter which university one chooses, the Jewish organization there will help keep the Jewish students in touch with one another.

The new executive will take office in September. I'm sure another productive year is ahead for the APJSF. We look forward to seeing new faces.

Sliding downward

It is hard to figure out what kind of violence will still have shock value a few years from now if things go on the way they are. Someone is disappointed with life and the failure of his business and goes to the top of the Empire State Building, shoots people at random and then kills himself. Another gets annoyed because someone toots at him while driving and he shoots the offending party in a new kind of drive-by killing. By the time this column is published, some other form of violence will have made the headlines.

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

It is popular to ascribe all this to television, which has relatively few offerings that do not, in one form or another, portray violence as a widespread solution to problems.

I am as appalled as anyone at TV offerings that have fouled the airscape around us. If it isn't an inane sitcom, it is a violence-ridden piece where, I sometimes suspect, the violence itself is the major content. Still, TV only responds to something that has been in existence for a long time — a trend that was in evidence ages before television was invented and became the centre of public attention, information and entertainment.

It will surprise some readers that the movement in this direction did not originate in the United States. It came to us 100 years ago from Europe, especially from France and Germany. At the end of the 19th century, artists, poets and expressionists of modernity showed a love of crime, the satanic outsider and the destruction of civilization. The early expressionists were in fact enamored with war as the ultimate expression of the human being, and after the World War I, terror became a legitimate part of the political landscape.

Writers like Juenger, Celine and Breton became the rage, and the last-named was famous for his saying that "the simplest surrealist deed is to go into the street, revolver in hand, and to shoot blindly into the crowd as long as there is ammunition."

The Holocaust and worldwide incidents of mass murder gave brutal expression to this trend. With all the wonderful ideals to pursue, we have been sliding downward, and television has become both the interpreter and sponsor of this descent. This cultural convulsion has become so extreme that the viewer hardly knows any more how to distinguish between reality and fiction. German author, H.M. Enzensberger, in his book dealing with the likelihood of civil war, puts it this way: "Thus television becomes a collection of giant graffiti that serve as prostheses for an autistically shrivelled I."

So, what can an individual do? I will suggest a small start, reckoning that anyone who reads my columns is already onside: Stop tuning in on stations that provide this kind of "entertainment." Sooner or later, Nielsen ratings will have their effect. It is a small step, but one in the right direction. It may very well be that despite the 50 channels we can choose from today and 100 tomorrow, public television will be our sole refuge from this cultural disaster.

Having said that, I might as well appeal to my readers to support the kind of television that stays clear of the current trend.

Living with pride and enthusiasm

While I was celebrating at our Purim party this year I glanced around the room and asked myself when a large group of students had last got together like this for a Jewish cause. To my dismay, the answer I came up with was the last memorial service for a tragedy in Israel. So I thought, when was the time before that? Again, I recalled, it was for another memorial service.

By Justin Korda in Montreal

The public recognition of tragedies that affect us all as Jews is vital to traditional Jewish thought, in addition to serving the purpose of raising awareness. However, memorial services should not be considered merely an inspiration to gather Jewish people together. In using memorial services and other causes of this sort to strengthen a sense of Jewish identity, a greater concept is being neglected. The reason public events like these are held is that we all feel affected by the tragedy. And we all feel affected because we all share the same Jewish heritage. The importance of these events has to be seen within the broader picture of our common Judaism and not the other way around. The event does not draw out our Judaism.

The problem is that we strive to find causes that will seem attractive to young Jews and make us want to come together. The truth is that there already is a cause. The cause is Judaism. What we must do is find a way to show that this cause is worthy. The richness of Judaism is currently hidden behind a number of other causes designed to get Jewish students "involved," causes like fighting anti-Semitism and fighting anti-Israel biases. Ironically, we thereby place the moral responsibility of uniting the Jewish people in the hands of the anti-Semites. That is quite an honor we give our enemies.

Spirituality, mysticism, guidance

This may lead Jewish people to be Jewish, but for negative reasons. Young people today should not want to live a Jewish life because we feel badly about all the suffering that Jews have endured throughout history. We should want to live as Jews out of pride and enthusiasm.

Many students look elsewhere for spiritual and communal contentment, when that contentment could be found within Jewish spirituality, mysticism, guidance, ethics and celebrations, all aspects of the bountiful tradition of Judaism that are being hidden. What remains is Judaism as a "sympathy religion."

The holiday of Purim serves as a example of this struggle. We celebrate the miracle of being spared from destruction at the hands of an evil anti-Semitic force. The approach that we take on Purim to commemorate this near-disaster was chosen for a very important reason. First of all, there is indeed recognition of the anti-Semitic threat, Haman. However, we do not stand for a moment of silence to remember his wrong doings. On the contrary, we remember him by not even giving him a moment of legitimacy. Each time his name is read aloud we block it out. This somewhat ridiculous-seeming act is significant in that we do not even try to understand the reasoning behind his evil; we do not look for its "cause." We would do well to adopt that same approach today.

Purim is a celebration of a miracle, a joyous occasion when people dress themselves up and proclaim their pride.

A concrete Jewish identity is acquired from being proud to be able to stand on the shoulders of thousands of years of Jewish contributions to mankind, not from a sense of guilt that makes us associate Judaism with tragic events.

Archeologist plumbs the secrets of Yavneh-Yam

Moshe Fischer is seriously searching for ancient Greek temples, not in Greece but in Israel.

By Sheldon Kirshner

A professor of classical archeology at Tel Aviv University, Fischer is project director of the Yavneh-Yam excavation, one of the most fascinating digs in Israel today.

"Yavneh-Yam was a cosmopolitan city with monumental buildings," he said in an interview during a recent visit to Toronto. "It was called Portus Jude, or the "harbor of the Jews."

Yavneh-Yam, known also as Iamnia-on-the Sea, was Yavneh's outlet to the Mediterranean Sea. Yavneh itself was one of the most significant centres of Jewish learning during the Roman period in the Land of Israel.

According to Fischer, Yavneh-Yam was built about 4,000 years ago by the Canaanites, during the Bronze Age. Subsequently settled by the Israelites, the Persians, the Greeks, the Romans, the Byzantines, the Phoenicians and the Mameluk Arabs, Yavneh-Yam fell into a state of disrepair approximately 600 years ago.

In historical terms, Yavneh-Yam is important because it sheds new light on the complex, sometimes violent relationship between Jews and Greeks during the Hellenistic era, when the Maccabean wars were raging.

Initially, Jews enjoyed good relations with Greeks in Yavneh-Yam, whose population was never greater than 20,000. But strife ensued when the Greeks tried to impose their culture and their values upon the Jews. So, for Jews, Yavneh-Yam became a symbol of Greek domination and oppression.

Cited by Roman geographers, Yavneh-Yam, some 20 kilometres south of Tel Aviv, was "discovered" by Israeli archeologists in the 1950s and 1960s. Surveys from the air and on the ground revealed a fortified enclosure bounded by freestanding ramparts. Due to a dearth of funds and a lack of sustained interest, the 20-hectare site was left more or less untouched until Fischer appeared on the scene.

Fischer, whose field of expertise is Hellenistic and Roman architecture in Eretz Yisrael, got involved in 1992 when one of his students presented him with a Greek jug he had stumbled upon in Yavneh-Yam.

Since then, Fischer has spent every summer there, plumbing its secrets with the help of volunteers from Israel and abroad.

Their labors have not been in vain. His team has unearthed the remains of mudbrick structures and such artifacts as jars, oil lamps, terracotta statuettes and coins, mainly from the Hellenistic and Phoenician periods.

When the fourth excavating season gets under way in the summer (June 29 to Aug. 22), he and his band of fellow archeologists and assistants plan to broaden their horizons.

"We'll be looking for Greek temples and government buildings," said Fischer. "In effect, we'll be excavating an entire city."

Fischer will also be seeking volunteers 16 and older and in good health. "It's hard but satisfying work," he said of the two-week shifts volunteers can apply for. "On an average day, we start at 5 a.m., stop for a hearty breakfast and finish at 1 p.m."

After a lengthy siesta, the volunteers exchange notes in so-called "find sessions." In the evenings, they attend an introductory archeology course on the Holy Land given by Fischer, and every other Sunday, they are taken around the country on a sightseeing trip.

"We've had a few Canadian volunteers," said Fischer. The majority, however, have been Americans, Germans, British, French, Israelis, Japanese and Spanish.

Moshe Fischer

The cost to participants is about $600 (US). This covers full room and board, the course and the exploratory trip.

Fischer can be reached at the department of classical studies at Tel Aviv University in Ramat Gan (972-3-6409779), or at home (972-3-93002293).

Before he set his sights on Yavneh-Yam, Fischer, a Romanian Jew who made aliyah in 1970, was co-director and director of several archeological projects.

On the southwest shore of the Dead Sea, near Masada, he excavated a Herodian perfume factory.

At Mazad Tamar, in the Negev desert, he dug up a Roman military fortress.

Near the panhandle of the Galilee, he found a Roman temple.

On the road from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem, he unearthed a Roman-era Jewish settlement named Khorvat Mazad.

And close to his home in Petach Tikvah, he excavated a 1,500-year-old church frequented by Christian pilgrims.

Born in Brasov in 1945, Fischer studied ancient history and archeology at the University of Bucharest and at the University of Basel in Switzerland. His specialty was Greek civilization in the region of the Black Sea. "It was a kind of preparation for the issues I would deal with after my arrival in Israel," he explained.

Fischer, part of whose family was murdered during the Holocaust, left Romania as a reaction to communism and anti-Semitism. Upon completing his military service in Israel, he resumed his studies at Tel Aviv University, graduating with a PhD in 1980.

Fischer, married with two children, is eager to get back to Yavneh-Yam, which is shaping up as an exceedingly interesting excavation. Once his work there is finished, probably in the year 2000, he intends to write a book about its historical significance within the context of Near Eastern civilizations.

And then, he hopes, the government will designate Yavneh-Yam as a tourist site-cum national park.

Wonderful lithographs

David Roberts, a Scotsman, was one of the greatest landscape artists of the 19th century. In 1838, fascinated by distant lands, he set sail for the Middle East, a trip which altered Europeans' concept of the region.

Travelling to what is now Egypt, Israel, the West Bank, the Gaza Strip, Jordan and Lebanon, Roberts produced a series of wonderful lithographs which were published in London and which assured him lasting fame.

Yesterday and Today, The Holy Land (General Publishing, no price listed) contains the original plates, in large format and in chronological order, of the first edition. Remarkably enough, each illustration is paired with a photograph which depicts the same scene more than a century later, and with extracts from Roberts' journal. It's an irresistible combination, a form of time travel.

The lithographs, marvels of draftsmanship and detail, are romantic and airy in tone and dominated by a range of tan colors, reflecting the topography and the climate of the Mideast. There are drawings of ancient ruins, dilapidated buildings, rugged terrain (in particular the ethereal Sinai Peninsula) and placid lakes (the Dead Sea at Ein Gedi and the Sea of Galilee). In addition, there are contemporary scenes of Jerusalem, Hebron, Nablus, Jaffa, Haifa, Acre and Nazareth.

An excellent coffee-table book you can dip into indefinitely.

THE BORINS BEAT

Happy 50th wedding anniversary to Al & Faye Mintz (Mintz & Partners). The whole Mintz family are terrific supporters of Reena.

Congratulations to solicitor Roger Rowe!!! What a wonderful winter for him. His son Jackson was born January 4th & his Canadian Black Lawyers Association was also created. Thanks to inveterate letter-writer (who keeps newspaper editors on their toes) and lawyer Bert Raphael, a great Reena supporter, for helping Roger and his group get started.

Other than Sheila Engel, the person I've written about the most through the years in my CJN, Bayview Post & Jewish Tribune columns, is Bert Raphael, Q.C. Yasher Koach to Bert on being chosen as one of Ontario's 61 recipients of the Law Society of Upper Canada's 1997 Bicentennial Award of Merit. The special award - marking the Society's 200th anniversary - recognizes the incredible contributions lawyers like Bert make to their towns and cities through community work. Bert was singled out for making a difference because of his years of dedication to public service.

It's a small world, isn't it? Ronny Gold (Gold's Luggage Shop Ltd.) was telling me her daughter Lorie is marrying Steven Israel on May 25th. Steven's mom happens to be Gail Israel, the Reena Foundation's newest board member and chair of special events like the upcoming Gala Dinner honouring MILES NADAL, two days later on May 27th.

Miles Nadal has always shown a generosity of time & spirit that can serve as an inspiration to everyone at Reena. It's ironic that in Howard Brown's column "The Personal Touch" in June, 1995 the second part of this column, after his kind words about Miles Nadal, discussed Reena. So here they are together again. The Gala Dinner's Tribute Committee Co-chairmen are Bert Raphael and Gerald Wilks. The Dinner Chairman is Lloyd S. D. Fogler, Q.C., "Genial Gerald Hartman, Reena Foundation Board Member and President and CEO of RDS Diagnostics Ltd., will serve as Event Chair."

The most response to my words in my over 40 years of jottings, has to be to the line in my last column congratulating Elli Davis on once again being #1 sales rep. in Canada for Royal LePage. She must have a ton of happy customers. They all phoned me. It seems this is her 10th consecutive year leading over 6,000 reps Wow!!!

There I was browsing through some current (sic) magazines at my doctor's office & came across a photo of Ken Darby's "Pancho". 1973 Egg Tempera. In this "current" 1986 issue of Equinox, it mentioned the art was hanging in the home of Mr. & Mrs. Irving Ungerman in Toronto. I couldn't help commenting to Dr. Stein that the reference to "EGG" & Ungerman reminded me of all the chickens who became "poultry in motion", at the Wheat Sheaf. We sold tons of Irving's wings in my 26 years as owner.

We are fortunate to have all the abovementioned fine people working for the benefit of Reena's community & for helping improve the lives of so many people.

Jerry Borins is the Capital Campaign Director for the Reena Foundation's Toby and Henry Battle Developmental Centre in Vaughan. The Centre will ensure people with developmental handicaps realize their full potential. The $7.7 million campaign will be successfully completed in May, 1997. Call Jerry at (416) 787-9554 ext. 3074 to discuss the dedication opportunities still available.

The family of the late

Themes of Passover

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

The Passover Haggadah weaves the themes of freedom and nationhood into our seder. It also speaks of the family unit and contains a beautiful statement of parental responsibility toward our children.

Within the Haggadah, we read of four children who seem to represent four archetypes: "the wise," "the wicked," "the naive" and "the one who does not know to question."

At first we accept these children as covering the myriad of character possibilities within our children. However, the statement in the Haggadah is far more complex.

This section of the Haggadah is introduced with the words: "The Torah speaks of four children," and indeed, the secret to the passage becomes clear if we search within the Torah for these four children.

In Deut. 6:20, we find the question that the "wise" child poses: "What are the testimonies that G-d our Lord has commanded you?" However, the answer that appears in the Torah is not the answer that appears in the Hagaddah.

In fact, the answer to the "wise" child's question appearing in the Torah parallels the answer that the Haggadah gives to the "naive" child: "G-d took us out of Egypt with a mighty Hand."

The same split occurs with the remaining two children. The "wicked" child's question appears in Ex. 12:26, yet the answer in the Torah is not the answer given in the Haggadah. The Torah represents "the child who does not know to question" in Ex. 13:8, and the response given to this child in the Torah is the response given to the "wicked" child in the Hagaddah.

In other words, the questions are separated from their answers and the Hagaddah uses this separation to group the four children into two groups: the wise and the naive; and the wicked and the one who does not know to question. The groupings seem odd until we look at the language carefully.

The simplicity of the "naive" child creates the image of a young child. The child asks: "What is this?" There is no evaluation made, but a neutral question is asked. The parent responds by saying that G-d took us out of Egypt. The parent is including the child in the answer since the word "us" appears. This child will grow into the "wise" child who uses inclusive language when asking a question. This child was raised as a part of the whole and will view him/herself in that way.

Likewise "the child who does not know to question" appears very young and since there is no question asked, the parent has an open field in which to respond. The parent says: "Due to this, G-d did [this] for me when I left Egypt." The parent has not said "us" and has excluded the child. This child will grow into the "wicked" child who excludes him/herself from the collective when asking questions.

The Haggadah has subtly yet clearly understood the Torah as a parental guide for nationhood. The people Israel can form a nation when our children are included and made to feel part of us. If we, as parents, exclude our children, even in our language, they will grow to exclude themselves.

Combatting genetic disease

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

Stanley Diamond, president of the Jewish Genealogical Society of Montreal, has become a medical-genealogical detective, in a bid to defuse what he calls a "ticking time bomb" and prevent potential suffering and death caused by thalassemia, a genetic disease.

The genetic trait responsible for thalassemia is common among Mediterranean peoples including Sephardi Jews, those whose ancestry can be traced back to medieval Spain, Portugal and areas of the eastern Mediterranean. However, the gene was thought not to exist among the Ashkenazi population of Jews whose ancestors lived in Germany and neighboring countries during the Middle Ages. Several years ago, doctors found it among members of Diamond's family, who are Ashkenazi and who carry a rare mutation called beta-thalassemia.

"It's a novel mutation that has never been seen before," said Diamond, a semi-retired businessman. "My first reaction was that I could find relatives because of this condition. Then it occurred to me that the increased incidence of intermarriage between Jews and gentiles creates a dangerous situation for Ashkenazi Jews who are carriers and don't know it.

The greater the lack of awareness, the greater the risk of two carriers marrying and having offspring with the disease."

Carriers are not stricken with the most potent form of the disease, but may experience a malady that is often misdiagnosed as mild chronic anemia. (To offset this, Diamond was prescribed iron pills as a child.)

When two carriers marry, chances are that one in four of their children will acquire the disease, which destroys red blood cells and causes large iron deposits in the liver and other organs. The disease is always fatal.

In the past year, Diamond has made several trips to Poland to visit archives where Jewish records are kept. Generally not known for their extreme helpfulness, archival officials rolled out the red carpet to him and his translator, offering full access to usually restricted records of Jewish births, marriages and deaths from 1808 to 1939.

"For humanitarian and scientific reasons, the Polish authorities were extremely generous with their time," he said. "They bent over backwards to ensure that I had cooperation at every level."

Diamond had previously traced his ancestry back some eight generations to 1760 and his Polish trips allowed him to uncover several lateral branches of his family tree down which the genetic trait may have descended. By tracking down distant cousins who carry the gene, Diamond has determined that it was carried by one of his great-grandparents, Yankel and Sara (nee Nowes) Widelec, who were likely born in the town of Ostrow Mazowiecka (Ostrova) about 1825.

Three years ago, as Dr. Charles Scriver of McGill University and the Children's Hospital of Montreal was studying the DNA in Diamond's blood to identify the beta-thalassemia gene, Dr. Ariella Oppenheim of Hadassah-Hebrew University Hospital in Jerusalem was seeking an identical gene in a Jerusalemite woman, Rita Paran, a Belarussian emigre suffering from anemia.

"My doctor got very excited when he heard about this," Diamond said. "He told me, 'If we can join these two families together, it can be the subject of a medical paper.' Well, he didn't know who he was talking to."

After studying Paran's ancestry, Diamond has determined that the gene passed through her grandmother, who came from a Belarussian town within 200 kilometres of the place where his ancestors lived. Because the disease is so rare, he is convinced that he and Paran are related. Based on their combined research, Diamond and Scriver co-authored a medical paper that appeared in January in a U.S.-based medical publication, Human Mutation Journal.

As he continues to trace distant relatives on his family tree, Diamond is using the Internet and the international network of Jewish genealogical societies to conduct a worldwide search for other Ashkenazi carriers of the gene, whose condition may or may not be known to them.

Since the discovery of beta-thalassemia in Diamond's family's DNA, the genetic trait has been found in 13 Ashkenazi families.

In a bid to retrieve more of his family history, Diamond is working with the U.S. Commission For The Preservation of America's Heritage Abroad to reassemble some old Jewish tombstones found in a farmer's field in Wyszkow, Poland. Working with 19th-century Jewish records, he has made an index of local Jews. Did your ancestors come from Wyszkow? If so, call him at 514-484-0100.

In 'neutral' Switzerland

By GERDA FRIEBERG

In 1945, after the Allied armies liberated the death camps of Europe, Holocaust survivors were urged to get on with their lives, rather than dwell on the past. It took years before the accounts of the experiences in death camps, ghettos and hiding places began to surface.

Many stories have already been told; many stories are yet to be told; and many will never be told.

Finally, more than 50 years after the war, the role of neutral Switzerland is being exposed. The time has therefore come to tell this story:

When the Jews of Berlin were being rounded up to be deported to Riga, Lodz and various camps in Poland, my aunt and uncle left for southern Germany. They discarded the yellow stars and changed their names from Alfred and Rosa Schindler to Schmiedler, because they thought Schindler was too Jewish a name. But they had no papers to establish their new identities.

Arriving in a small town, they went to the authorities and told them: "We were bombed out in Berlin and lost everything including our identification papers. We were so happy to be alive that we just got on the train to escape the bombardment of the city."

Somehow their story was convincing, and with their new papers in hand and under a new name, they settled where they hoped to live till the end of the war.

One Sunday morning, a young boy greeted them with great excitement. "I am so happy to see you," he said. "You must remember me. We lived in the backyard in your house. Wait till I tell my parents!"

There was no time to waste. As a contingency plan just in case something went wrong, they had made contact earlier with someone who smuggled people into Switzerland. They immediately contacted him, paid the agreed upon fee and when night fell, began their trek through the forest.

Suddenly the man told them: "This is as far as I go. I cannot afford to be caught near the border smuggling Jews." He disappeared, leaving them in the darkness.

They sat for a while not knowing in which direction to proceed, until they heard church bells ringing and decided to follow the sound, without knowing if they were headed toward Switzerland or back to Germany.

It was almost dawn when they realized they had crossed the border into Switzerland. They were overjoyed, but their joy did not last long. They were picked up by border guards who escorted them back to the border.

Exhausted, my aunt and uncle told the guards the truth: They were Jews fleeing Nazi persecution.

"Sorry," the guard said. "We do not harbor Jews in our country."

At the station, my aunt pleaded with them: "Look, we are elderly people. My husband is sick and walks with a cane."

The supervisor offered my uncle asylum due to his age and to his disability. But they had orders to send my aunt back to Germany.

"If you send us back we will be shot," my aunt told them. "I suggest you shoot both of us right here, rather than have the Nazis do it for you. But first, I want to settle my finances. Contact my bank in Zurich. We have a numbered account and would like to withdraw the money."

Contacts were made and her story was verified. After many hours of negotiation, they were allowed to stay and were taken to a refugee camp Winterthur.

After the war, my aunt contacted the Red Cross in search of family. The reply was devastating. No one could be found.

In the meantime, I arrived with my mother and my sister at the Landsberg displaced persons (DP) camp. My mother refused to believe that her sister had perished and contacted every organization that dealt with refugees. Finally, after many inquiries we were informed that they might be in Switzerland.

It was impossible, though, for my mother to travel there. Survivors were stateless and no country would issue us passports. Moreover, survivors were not welcome in Switzerland without a work permit, and there was little, if any, chance of obtaining one.

The only way to find my aunt and uncle was to get to Switzerland illegally. My sister took the train to a village on the Swiss border and crossed over at night. She found herself in Shafausen, where she managed to find a Jewish family.

When she told them she was a survivor in search of her family, they called the Jewish community offices in Zurich and asked about Alfred and Rosa Schindler. Unbelievably, the record of the family was found. They were alive and living in Winterthur.

The office arranged my sister's fare and called our aunt to inform her that her niece would be arriving in Winterthur by train. A large crowd was gathered to greet her, as she was the first Holocaust survivor to arrive and scores of people wanted to witness the reunion.

But the happiness was short lived. Two days later, with my uncle in the hospital to have his leg amputated and my aunt at his side, two police officers came to the apartment to arrest my sister for having illegally entered the country.

Just as my aunt and uncle had done two years before, my sister convinced the officers not to take her to the police station before my aunt returned from the hospital. The police allowed her to stay for two days. Then they escorted her back to the German border.

There had been no room for Jewish refugees escaping certain death at the hands of the Nazis. Nor was there any compassion to allow the survivors to enjoy a short reunion.

This was an example of the humanity of neutral Switzerland.

Researcher explores lost world of Marrano Jews

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Gloria Mound, executive director of Casa Shalom, the Institute for Marrano (Anusim) Studies in Israel, was sitting with an elderly woman whose name she recognized as crypto-Jewish.

"Like most Marranos, she denied everything," Mound recalls. But when the British-born researcher produced a Megillah page, the older woman recognized it as Hebrew and burst into tears. "To me it was very telling."

Mound told that story during a recent lecture at Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation. The evening event, attended by about 100 people, was jointly sponsored by Beth David's sisterhood and Petah Tikva Anshe Castilla Congregation.

Mound has been researching secret Jewish communities since 1978. Her interest was sparked on Majorcan vacations in the late '60s.

In 1985, she and husband Leslie, then a newly retired businessman, moved from London to Ibiza. They wanted to spend a year learning about its Jewish history and that of Formentera, another of the Balearic Islands near southern Spain.

On Majorca, the controlling island, the Inquisition was active until the 1800s , but on the smaller islands, chuetas (as crypto-Jews are known in that part of the world) were protected by the locals.

The Mounds' year on Ibiza turned into three before they made aliyah as planned. During that time they discovered a pre-1942 Megillat Esther (now being restored by the Spanish government) and two secret synagogues, one in the basement of an Ibiza convent, where, it turned out, the elderly woman had worshipped as a child.

Part of the Mounds' work was funded by a grant from Beth Hatefutsoth, the Tel Aviv-based Diaspora museum, which has 300 of their photos in its archives.

In 1988, Gloria Mound's work earned her the title Honorary Research Fellow of the University of Glasgow, an honor that has been renewed each year since.

Her research has also taken the Mounds to Sao Tome y Principe, two small islands off the west coast of Africa, which were Portuguese colonies until 20 years ago.

In 1493, King Manuel of Portugal deported 2,000 Jewish children to Sao Tome y Principe. Although only 600 survived their first year on the crocodile-infested islands, they managed to keep Jewish practice alive there for generations, Mound said.

Mound is now awaiting Inquisition archives material including 571 pages on Sao Tome, which was only recently made available to researchers.

She also has an interest in the Persian Jews of Meshed, whose community "came to a complete halt" following pogroms in 1830.

Like many of their Marrano counterparts, who were outwardly Catholic, the Meshed community maintained Jewish tradition and eschewed intermarriage. Like good Muslims, they went on pilgrimage to Mecca, but many "got lost" on the way back and detoured to Israel.

The institute Mound founded in Gan Yavneh fields many inquiries from people of possible Jewish ancestry. "We try to answer their questions and lead them to at least a pride in their heritage."

Some take it a step further. A Marrano man who knew little of his heritage began taking conversion classes in Israel and hopes to become a rabbi.

The process can be very difficult for families. "Quite often one child is a very staunch Catholic while another wishes to re-identify with Judaism," Mound said.

A letter she received from Brazil reported a practice of crypto-Jews, which (if true) highlights their desperately sad plight. The writer told of her grandmother's village memories of crypto-Jews summoning a priest for last rites — but always too late.

Audible gasps were heard from the audience when Mound said that the dying person would be suffocated if it was feared that, in a state of delirium, he or she would reveal the family's Jewish practices.

At least one Portuguese historian suggests such stories arose as an attempt to explain the belated summoning of the priest, but Mound said that a credible source — a 1902 copy of the Jewish Historical Review — reported a Portuguese guild of suffocators .

Mound and her husband have made inroads in bringing more life — Jewish life — back to crypto-Jews. In Ibiza, where they ran a Sunday cheder and opened their home for Passover seders and Shabbat, the Mounds hope to run another seder this year. They expect about 50 chuetas will participate with them.

Clarification

VAUGHAN — City councillor Mario Racco, who had been seeking the federal Liberal nomination in the new riding of Thornhill until Elinor Caplan was appointed, has taken issue with a quote from Caplan that appeared in the March 20 issue of The CJN.

Caplan was quoted as saying that Racco, who came out forcefully against the appointment, "would have accepted an appointment" himself.

Racco denies that. He says he never would accept an appointment, nor has he said as much.

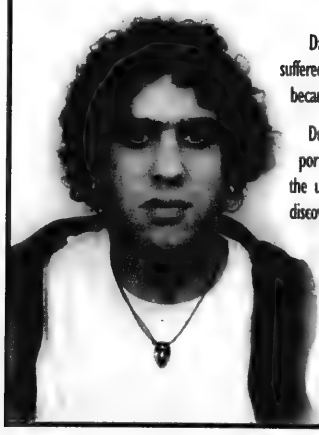
David Sharav. Unwavering Belief



David Sharav was only 21 when, during his first year of army service, he was involved in a horrific car accident. He suffered severe brain damage, memory loss, and after being in a coma for over a week, his right arm was paralyzed. Dudu became deeply depressed during his recovery.

Dudu was referred to the Beit Halochem Centre in Tel Aviv for rehabilitation. The staff was able to offer him the support he so desperately needed. Dudu always believed he would get better - and he did. He regained his memory and the use of his arm. Gradually his depression lifted. The recreational therapist persuaded him to start art classes, and he discovered a wonderful talent.

'After my accident, I felt unbelievably isolated. I couldn't do anything for myself, but somehow when I came to Beit Halochem, I felt at home with the other disabled soldiers. When I came to Toronto in 1996 with other disabled war veterans, I felt I was finally on the road to recovery. The warmth and love of the Jewish community made me realize that people really care, and I could make friends and be happy again. Beit Halochem is my lifeline.'

Synagogue trivia contest helps Zareinu

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Nearly 300 people competed in a multimedia trivia contest held recently at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation, and managed not only to have fun, but to raise $7,000 for Zareinu Educational Centre, a school for children with multiple handicaps.

This is the second year that the event has been held, said Dahna Rosenblum, who co-ordinated the evening along with Tamar Koschitzky.

It all started with wanting to throw a party, and "it evolved into a fundraiser," she said. We decided that Zareinu was a really good cause, formed a committee," and the rest, as they say, was history.

This year, participants identified slides, music and perfume samples and took part in taste tests. Sports, Jewish knowledge and art were among the topics covered.

Each member of the winning team received a gift certificate to King Solomon's Table.

Michael Briks

Briks goes to JIAS

TORONTO — Michael Briks has been appointed national executive director of Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS), replacing Susan Davis.

Briks comes to the post from Ontario's Ministry of Citizenship, Culture and Recreation, where he was manager of community regional services.

He has extensive background in government, settlement agencies and the Jewish community.

Briks has a doctorate in educational administration from the University of Toronto, a master's in social work and a master's in criminology. He has also completed the advanced level program in Alternate Dispute Resolutions at the University of Windsor's faculty of law.

Briks has published extensively in such areas as human rights, employment equity and casework intervention.

Student relations deteriorate

specting the sensitivities of Arab students, said Herbert Brill, JSU's political action coordinator. During Arab Culture Week, the Palestinian display stated that it was the Israeli government's policy to massacre people and that Israeli paratroopers were killers. The map of "Palestine" included Israel and had no political boundaries, he added.

Last year on Israel Day, organizers avoided any political issues and even employed an aerial view of the region to avoid including a map with political boundaries, Davis said. Jewish students are now saying we should be more up front in following our own political agenda, he added.

Despite that growing attitude, some Jewish students associated with the JSU wish to continue the JSU's two-year-old attempt to foster better relations with Arab students. Ari Fried has undertaken his own, "totally unofficial, very casual" contacts, discussing issues with Palestinian students in the university library.

But he too was disappointed at last week's lecture, which was billed as a forum for open discussion but which he believed "was a forum to express discontent with the peace process....You realize you have to build a bridge of trust and then you get one of these meetings and it's backward, like something out of the 1970s."

Layal El Abdallah, secretary and coordinator of the Arab Students Association, which mounted the controversial Palestinian display, agrees there is the need for better relations. But she defended the display and comparison of Israelis to Nazis.

She said she was offended by a soldier's uniform at the Israel Day exhibit, and she then compared Israeli soldiers to Nazis, saying Israelis had massacred Palestinians.

As for the display, "we have certain views and we didn't want to attack anybody," she said.

She said the relationship between Jewish and Arab students "can't get worse. It's going to get better, but it takes time, patience and an open mind," she said.

A WORLD OF JEWISH WOMEN

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Susan Charness and Farah Perelmuter just want to make a difference.

Charness, 50, and Perelmuter, 27, were both nominees for the ninth annual Women Who Make a Difference Awards, presented by

Susan Charness

Toronto Life Fashion and The Hudson's Bay. Co.

Established to recognize the achievements of Toronto women, the awards are presented in such categories as the arts, business professional, communications, community affairs, early achiever and entrepreneur.

As owner of Susan Charness Talent, an 8-year-old talent agency for people with disabilities, Charness says, "I started the agency because I realized there were no disabled people in advertising or on television. I am trying to change social attitudes. People are not handicapped by disabilities, but rather, by the attitude of others."

Charness, who had polio as a youngster in Halifax, says that the public sees people with disabilities as either how they are portrayed on telethons or as "Rick Hansen-types. In between these two spectrums are people like me and my clients – ordinary people who happen to have a disability. We are people first."

She says that none of her over 100 clients had ever acted. "They had the desire, but they needed the chance. Given that chance, I can see the tremendous change in them. When people see them in a positive light, that is how they react and they feel good about themselves. The fun part of my work is opening up doors and letting people walk through. Incredible things happen."

In a perfect world, says Charness, disabled people would be able to audition for every part.

"Right now, if it is not written into the script they cannot get in. It is always stipulated what type of disability [producers and directors] want to see; so in fact, the disability comes before the person. What I want, is for everyone to be treated equally.

Special Olympics volunteer

"We've come a long way in eight years, but not nearly long enough for me."

Perelmuter, nominated in the young achievers category, is president and founder of Speakers' Spotlight, a 2-year-old company that books speakers for conferences around the world.

"The exciting part of my business is meeting some of Canada's most interesting people," she says. "From discussing sports with Paul Henderson or talking fashion with Harry Rosen, to having coffee with Margaret Trudeau Kemper, I think my job is fascinating. I think many meeting planners are now realizing what Canada has to offer. We have world aclaimed speakers right in our own backyard."

Farah Perelmuter

Volunteer work is an important part of Perelmuter's life, she says, and a highlight for her was her work with the 1997 Special Olympics World Winter Games. She was a member of the marketing committee, co-commissioner of the speakers bureau and was responsible for developing and training a group of athlete and volunteer spokespersons.

"It was an incredible experience, working with these athletes. Whether they won or not, they were all supportive of one another and happy to be participating in the games. It helped me put a perspective on my life."

Panelists explore importance of their Jewish identity

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — As a radio talk show host, Marsha Lederman describes herself as an "out-of-the-closet" Jew.

In a similar vein, Ralph Benmergui of CBC Newsworld advised Jewish campus leaders during a recent program at Adath Israel Congregation never to apologize for being Jewish.

The two journalists (neither of whom work on Jewish holidays) joined Freda Muscovitch, the driving force behind Holy Blossom Temple's Out of the Cold Program for homeless people, on a panel at the Jewish Campus Services leadership development program. The panelists discussed how they express their Jewish identity in their work or volunteer life.

A major influence on Lederman, both personally and professionally, was being a child of Holocaust survivors, she said.

Even as a youngster, she wondered how the world let the Holocaust happen, a question that still haunts her. Journalism provided the "opportunity to combine the things I was good at with a desire to make the world aware."

In 1994, while still a reporter at AM640 (now Talk 640), where she can be heard these days co-hosting the weekday show Horsman/Lederman, she produced, wrote and served as interviewer on a five-part Holocaust documentary. The series earned her a Radio and Television News Directors Association of Canada award.

Her four-part documentary on

Freda Muscovitch

Marsha Lederman

Ralph Benmergui

AIDS victims ran this year.

"If I made people care... maybe I've given them the opportunity to speak up next time something awful happens," she said.

But there's also "bad stuff" about being openly Jewish, Lederman noted. She considers on-air calls with anti-Semitic overtones "a good opportunity" to set the record straight, but knows she won't get through to everyone. Most such negative feedback can be found on the show's voice mail, she said. "You just have to take it with a grain of salt."

Lederman is convinced there is a reason for her parents' survival and her existence: to give people "the courage, knowledge and opportunity to speak up... You guys go out and do it!"

Moroccan-born Benmergui sees himself as a minority within a minority.

Journalism is a logical choice for Jews, he believes. "The thing about being a Jew of any kind... is that it leads you to deconstruct things quickly and find out how to fit in."

Over the past 20 years in comedy and journalism, Benmergui has "made it a point to be an ethnic person.

"I can't see the purpose of keeping our heads down."

Benmergui worries about insular groups of Jews who see themselves as right and others as wrong. "Things are wrong if you don't hear that other people have legitimacy as people. You dehumanize them.

"You have to take pride in where you come from and who you are, but please try not to be exclusive about this."

It's incumbent on Jews to learn about other faiths, he believes, so "they don't become just 'other.' That's what we are to them."

Using touchy Israeli political issues as an example, he urged students to open themselves to the possibility of changing their minds. "Stay confused," he advised.

Muscovitch, as a downtown resident, had long been aware of Toronto's homeless population. As an educator in the field of alcohol and drug abuse, she wondered whether giving money to street people was just "maintaining their habit."

"What can we do that isn't token?" she wondered. The answer came to her about three years ago, when she heard a radio broadcast about Out of the Cold, a food and shelter program run at some two dozen Toronto churches.

Hearing that it was non-denominational, she inquired whether there was Jewish participation.

With the support of Rabbi Dow Marmur and Holy Blossom's social action committee, Muscovitch organized an apprenticeship program at a downtown church, where her Holy Blossom contingent, bolstered by other members of the Jewish community including a substantial number of campus volunteers, could learn the ropes before launching their own self-sustaining program affiliated with Out of the Cold.

"When you see something, respond to it," she urged. "Seek mentors." To her, leadership means providing nurturance, taking on a challenge and doing the legwork. "There are always people who will support you."

Intergenerational program helps students, seniors

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Betina Kuzmarov, a fourth-year University of Toronto student, has a new perspective on aging, thanks to a monthly intergenerational program that began last fall under her aegis as social action co-chair for U of T's Jewish Student Union (JSU).

The seniors in the program are participants in a group that meets weekly at the Bloor Jewish Community Centre for social/cultural/educational programs.

Their monthly intergenerational events have been a joint effort of the students and Judy Weinryb, JCC seniors' coordinator.

"It's a very positive thing," said Weinryb. "The students are terrific. They put in a lot of effort. They're very creative."

The first session, held in October, was a storytelling/getting-to-know-each-other session held on campus, resulting from the JSU's participation in the Downtown Community Council, a group of downtown Jewish organizations.

Kuzmarov's co-chair, Naomi Rifkind, has been overseeing a second intergenerational program, a weekly event at Lincoln Place Nursing Home.

Mid-April Shabbat dinners at the Bernard Betel Centre and Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, as well as a Shabbat lunch at the Bloor JCC, are upcoming intergenerational events.

At a recent JCC event, Kuzmarov and three other students (less than half the usual number because of exams) organized a Purim event. Participants made Mishloach Manot baskets to be delivered to shut-ins. Kuzmarov taught a couple of Purim songs and led a discussion on the story of Purim.

At 85, Sylvia Kane is probably the senior senior of the group. A going concern, she goes to the JCC often, exercising twice weekly and attending current event classes as well as the Thursday group.

Kane is delighted about the intergenerational program. "I'm happy to see good youth who do good things and set an example for other youth. We need stable youth role models to show the other youth who do not read much, who sit by the television and want to be entertained, to get them interested in more things. It's good for them and the community."

The students are "great," enthused Fanny Brass, 77.

Morris Eisen, who attends the group with his wife Helen, likes seeing young people, he said. For Helen, the student programs provide a change of pace.

"I think they're very entertaining and stimulating. The students don't look down on seniors," said septuagenarian Mollie Rotman, who particularly enjoyed their Tu b'Shvat seder program. "I think most people weren't even aware there was a seder at Tu B'Shvat."

For her part, Kuzmarov has loved working with the seniors, she said. "It's been such a rewarding experience. My grandparents live in Montreal. I don't get to experience them on a day-to-day basis. Most importantly, this has taught me a positive way to age."

This type of program "transcends all these differences we think separate us," said Lance Davis, JSU program director.

BBC presents Media Human Rights Awards

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

Allan Rock

WINNIPEG — An article on Ku Klux Klan activities in Saskatchewan in the 1930s, a Toronto Star series on spousal abuse, a retrospective on the Nuremberg trials 50 years later, and a Quebec television documentary suggesting a cover-up in the deaths of two Inuit fishermen were the winners in the recent 22nd annual B'nai Brith Canada National Media Human Rights Awards.

The Quebec piece, aired by Radio-Canada, explored the unsolved deaths, 17 years ago, of the two Inuit, with allegations of a cover-up by authorities. The program also highlighted the ongoing problems between native people and Quebec police.

In the radio category, the winning entry was Nuremberg On Trial, a two-part CBC Radio Ideas program comparing the Nuremberg trials with the recent trials of alleged war criminals in Bosnia.

The Moosomin, Sask. World Spectator won in the Print/Non-dailies category for its look at the history and influence of the Klan in that province in the 1920s and 1930s. The article suggested that the Saskatchewan Klan was more a political than a violent racist movement.

Honorable mentions in the Print Non/Dailies category were given to the Western Jewish Bulletin for a series revealing the unfair treatment of Vancouver Jews with AIDS and Toronto's NOW magazine for an exposé of Jewish conspiracy theories in the Polish press in that city.

Winnipeg played host to the awards for the third year in a row. The keynote speaker this year was federal Justice Minister Allan Rock.

Rock spoke of Canada's diverse ethnic make-up but warned, "There is no room for complacency. We have to be continually taking stock and striving to do better. The struggle is never over, the race never won."

He spoke of judicial progress in the last three years in terms of human rights. He noted, as an example, the amendment to the Criminal Code which instructs courts and judges, in passing sentence, to take into consideration hatred or prejudice in the commission of a crime.

On the subject of Nazi war criminals living in Canada, Rock observed that "too many Canadian governments for too long did too little." He described his government's actions to deal with the problem by bringing immigration proceedings against a dozen alleged war criminals in an effort to deport them.

"We are committed to pursuing these cases wherever warranted," he said. "We will find the resources we need. There is no statute of limitation on murder. This is a matter of simple human morality."

It is not only World War II war criminals about which the Canadian government is prepared to take action. "We will no longer allow Canada to become a haven for any alleged war criminals, past or present," Rock said.

The evening featured the inaugural presentation of a regional Human Rights Achievement Award to Helmut-Harry Loewen, an anti-racist activist and founder and research director of WARN (the Western Anti-Racist Network).

He pointed out that he is part of a growing international network of anti-racists who track, monitor and, at times, confront and counter racists and their propaganda. "The fight goes on at many levels," he said. "The situation in Winnipeg mirrors Canada as a whole. You will find the Klan, the European Defence League, the Northern Hammerskins in several cities across the country."

He praised Winnipeg Jewish skinhead leader Yaron Walter for his anti-racist efforts.

On May 12, he reported, Winnipeg will be the site of the most important hate crimes trial in Canadian history. Four neo-Nazis are facing a murder charge in the death of Gordon Kuhtey four years ago. The attackers allegedly thought Kuhtey was gay because he was walking alone in an area of Winnipeg known to be frequented by gay men.

"There will be tension around the trial," Loewen said. "Our concern is that some of the witnesses are weakening. Manitoba does not have a good track record in prosecuting neo-Nazis."

Jewish anglophone to help promote a separate Quebec

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The man who will have the tough job of explaining separation and selling Quebec as a good place to invest over the next few years to Wall Street is David Levine, a Jewish anglophone who embraced Quebec independence over 20 years ago and has spent his entire career in the francophone milieu.

Levine, director-general of Notre Dame Hospital for five years, is taking a leave of absence to assume a new position at the province's delegation in New York in May.

Initially, Levine will serve as "multilateral delegate for international organizations," acting as liaison with such bodies as the United Nations and the World Bank. This fall, he is to assume the top post of delegate-general, when Kevin Drummond's mandate ends, continuing his multilateral duties. The term is generally three years.

Quebec has three delegates-general — in London, Paris and New York — as well as lower-ranked representation in Brussels, Tokyo and Mexico City.

In New York, the quasi-diplomatic delegation has a largely economic role, trying to help Quebec businesses sell their wares in the United States and attract American investment. The office also promotes Quebec's artists and cultural products, deals with immigration, and monitors U.S. public affairs.

Levine will oversee a staff of about 30, located in Rockefeller Centre, and spend a good deal of time in Washington as well. In fact, the office is responsible for the eastern half of the United States.

"It will be a dynamic time, with a [Quebec] election within the next two years, and if the government wins, a referendum after that. Being in New York will give me an interesting window to events," he said.

Americans see it as an internal Canadian matter

Levine doesn't think Americans, either those in politics or business, are all that concerned with separation. "The government sees it as an internal Canadian matter and, among investors, they may be concerned with the consequences of sovereignty, but not with sovereignty as such."

He believes that if Americans are shown what Quebec has to offer, they will realize separation need not mean a "significant disruption" in the pursuit of their financial interests. He will be presenting Quebec, with its bilingualism, as a "middleman" between North America and Europe.

"I will explain why the current situation exists, where sovereignty came from. But I'm certainly not going to try to convince Americans. They are not going to vote here."

Levine, 48, grew up in the West End, attended Solomon Schechter Academy and was USY director at Shaare Zion Congregation. He graduated from McGill in engineering and then went to England to study biomedical engineering.

He says he never spoke French until he enrolled at the Ecole des Hautes Etude Commerciales, where one of his professors was Jacques Parizeau. In 1979, he ran for the Parti Québécois in the D'Arcy McGee byelection, at the request of then premier René Levesque who hoped he could explain the upcoming sovereignty referendum to anglophones.

His early flirtation with independence was rooted in his identification with social democratic politics. Today, he supports separation "out of respect for Quebecers' legitimate aspirations."

Before coming to Notre Dame, Levine has worked over the past 25 years mainly in health care administration, including directing Verdun Hospital and one of the first CLSCs in Montreal.

Levine is no stranger to New York. His sister Elissa and her husband Albert Benchimol have lived there 10 years and he visits about four times a year. She is head of rehabilitation services at Mount Sinai Hospital and he is an executive with the Reliance insurance company.

Levine will be moving with his wife Arlene, a Vanier College teacher, and their three teenaged children.

Sometimes the Simplest Things are the Most Special.

Everyone has their own idea of what simple means. To us at The Simple Alternative it means good taste and common sense. Simplicity is one of the hallmarks of Jewish funeral tradition. Expensive caskets and elaborate services are not part of this tradition. And, as many of our families tell us: sometimes the simplest things are the most special.

THE CURIEL FAMILY AT PASSOVER

This painting by Bernard Picart (1673 - 1733) captures one of Judaism's most celebrated memory-sustaining rituals, the Passover seder. The Curiel family were celebrated members of the Jewish communities of both Hamburg and Amsterdam. Jacob Curiel, alias Duarte Nunez de Costa (1587-1665) was born in Lisbon and after a period of wandering in Italy and Holland, finally settled in Hamburg. [All photos of paintings in the Passover Food section are reproduced from Sotheby's Important Judaica Catalogues.]

Best advice on eating is to use common sense

Forget "good foods" and "bad foods" — all foods can fit into healthy eating!

"Healthy eating does not mean eliminating particular foods or food groups," says dietitian Pierrette Buklis, director of nutrition communications for the Canadian Sugar Institute. "It does mean making informed food choices and keeping you nutritional goals in mind."

Studies consistently show that when it comes to food and nutrition, consumers are confused by the often contradictory information they hear. While they want to make healthy food choices, they are reluctant to sacrifice taste and pleasure for nutritional value.

The good news is that all foods that add taste and enjoyment to a food or recipe have a role to play in healthy eating. For instance, sugar, which contains half the calories of fat, is an important source of carbohydrates and energy.

International studies indicate Canadians are eating sugar at a level consistent with Health Canada's definition of healthy eating and a recent nationwide tracking study by the Canadian Sugar Institute showed that nearly half the women surveyed felt sugar in moderation should be included in the diet.

Sugar on its own fits into the Other Foods group of Canada's Food Guide to Healthy Eating. As a component in other foods, it can be found in all other food groups, in items such as fruits, breads, yogurt, milk beverages and baked beans. Health Canada recommends we get most of our daily energy from carbohydrates, including sugars.

"Some of the best advice on healthy eating is really common sense," says Buklis. "Eat a variety of foods from all food groups, eat moderate portions, maintain a healthy weight and balance your food choices over time."

The dietitians at the Canadian Sugar Institute have the following tips for following a healthy diet:

• Make changes gradually. Putting an instant stop to any of your favorite foods will likely backfire in the long run.

Keep portions small

• Reduce, don't eliminate certain foods. If you eat too much of one food one day, simply cut back or choose something new the next day.

• Balance your food choices over time. A healthy diet is based on long-term eating habits based on a variety of foods.

• Start off with small portions. You can always go back for seconds.

• Remember, foods are neither good nor bad. Everying in moderation.

• Sugars add flavor, which can help us enjoy nutritious foods, such as whole grain products, that are important to our health. A little sugar as an ingredient in foods makes them more appetizing and satisfying. Try glazed carrots, bran muffins or chocolate milk.

• Did you know sugar has other functions in food? When baking, remember sugar can absorb and retain water very easily, helping to keep breads and muffins moist and tender. Sugar also prevents growth of bacteria, in items such as jams and preserves. And canned fruits retain their bright color better when kept in a sugar solution.

• The size of portions and the number of times you eat rich foods can be more detrimental to the waistline than what's actually in the food. For people who are trying to lose weight, it is important to remember that each gram of fat supplies nine calories, while each gram of sugar supplies only four:

• A little jam or jelly can replace butter or margarine as a spread.

• Half the amount of oil in a muffin recipe can often be replaced by a sweetened fruit purée, such as applesauce.

Lip-smacking photos make cookbook inspiration

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

It is possible to eat healthy on Pesach. It's not something people usually do, but it is possible.

Try Lucy Waverman's Fast & Fresh Cookbook, recently reprinted by Firefly Books. While it is not particularly Pesachdik, just reading it gives you inspiration to use more fresh fruits and vegetables in imaginative ways, grill and bake foods instead of frying them during Chol Ha'Moed, and use interesting spices rather than fat.

The color photographs are lip-smacking, and the liberal use of sketches makes the book enjoyable to look at.

Her tips for leftovers, for keeping food fresh, and for altering recipes to make them healthier will be useful. Ever thought of keeping cooked fish fresh by marinading it in lemon juice and oil, or layering leftover roast beef with finely chopped onion, sliced tomatoes and chopped pickles then drizzling each layer with a spoonful of vinaigrette?

Or combining leftover poultry with greens and dressing the whole dish with spicy vinaigrette for a fast and easy supper?

After Pesach, enjoy her many recipes using beans, grains and rice.

Here are a few of Waverman's recipes suitable for a dairy Pesach meal.

COLD CUCUMBER SOUP

1 cup grated cucumber, plus 4 thin slices
1 cup Passover yogourt
1/2 cup pareve chicken stock
1/2 cup tomato juice
1 tbsp. grated fresh ginger
1 clove garlic, minced
2 tbsp. Passover vinegar
2 tbsp light cream
2 tbsp. mint, finely chopped
salt and pepper to taste

In a medium bowl, blend together grated cucumber, yogourt, stock and tomato juice. Add ginger, garlic, vinegar, cream, and 1 tbsp. mint. Season with salt and pepper and chill.

Serve cold with a garnish of cucumber slices and remaining mint. Serves 4

GRILLED SALMON WITH GINGER ORANGE BUTTER

1/2 cup butter, at room temperature
1 tbsp. grated fresh ginger
grated rind and juice of 1/2 orange
1-1 1/2 lb. salmon fillet
1 tbsp. Passover olive oil
salt and pepper to taste

In a food processor or by hand, cream together butter, ginger, orange rind and juice. Refrigerate until needed.

With a sharp knife angled almost parallel to the skin, slice salmon into slices 1/2 in. thick, starting at the thicker end.

Line a baking sheet with foil. Place salmon on top. Brush with oil and season with salt and pepper.

Broil salmon for 3 minutes, or until white juices rise to the surface. Do not turn salmon. Serve with dab of ginger orange butter. Serves 4

GARLICKY MASHED POTATOES

4 baking potatoes, peeled and quartered
8 cloves garlic, unpeeled
1/4 cup butter
1/2 cup milk
salt and pepper to taste

Place potatoes and garlic in a pot of cold water to cover. Bring to a boil. Simmer until potatoes are tender, about 10 min. Drain and press garlic cloves out of their skins.

With potato masher or electric beater, mash potatoes and garlic together. Beat in butter and milk. Season. Serves 4

Jazz up those tempting 'taters

Potatoes are a meal-time staple, especially on Pesach. Make your potatoes count for even more taste by jazzing them up with a tempting topping. Try these family-pleasers from Foodland Ontario.

- It's Greek to me: Top potatoes with diced greenhouse tomatoes, sliced olives and Passover feta cheese.
- Salsa yummy: Top potatoes with Passover salsa and a little sour cream or plain yogurt.
- Sweet dreams: Try sweet potatoes topped with mushrooms sautéed in butter and basil.
- Cheese, please: Start with a baked potato. Add sautéed mushrooms, tomatoes or onion. Top with the Passover cheese of your choice — cheddar, Monterey or mozzarella — for instance, and broil just until melted.
- Do it yourself: Allow for some mealtime experimentation, with a selection of toppings for personal potato-dressing.

Cookbook offers plethora of ideas

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Usually when you look at a cookbook, you find a few recipes in each section that you like. If you are organized, you look through the index to find, for instance, gefilte fish.

The Complete Harrowsmith Cookbook (Firefly Books, 1996) is another kind of cookbook. Virtually every page has a plethora of ideas that the interested cook will want to try. Even kosher cooks will find lots to interest them, from avocado coriander soup, a processed mix of avocados, lime juice, and coriander; veal marengo, veal cutlets cooked with dry red wine, tomatoes, garlic, mushrooms and tarragon; cream cheese cookies, all the way to chocolate amaretto cheesecake.

And what could be wrong with duck with blueberries and vegetables?

Each recipe is prefaced with notes about the source of the recipe, or a mouthwatering description.

Instructions are clear, and not overly complicated, which is always a plus for the busy cook.

Here are a few examples that can liven up your Pesach table:

EGGPLANT AND CHICKEN

1 chicken, cut up
2 tbsp. oil
2 cloves garlic, minced
1 unpeeled eggplant, cut into 1-inch cubes
1 onion, diced
6 tomatoes, peeled and sliced
1/2 cup dry red Passover wine
1 tsp. Passover oregano
1 tsp. Passover basil
1/4 tsp. pepper
salt

In large pan, brown chicken on all sides in oil with garlic. Add eggplant and onion and sauté for 5 minutes. Add tomatoes, wine and spices. Cover and let simmer for 1 hr., stirring occasionally. Serves 4.

BEET VEGETABLE SOUP

1 cup cubed potatoes
1 cup cubed carrots
1 cup cubed beets
1/4 tsp. salt
pepper
1 cup sour cream

Cook potatoes, carrots and beets in 1 cup water until just done. Add salt and pepper, remove from heat and stir in sour cream. Serves 4.

VEGETABLES A LA GRECQUE

1 1/2 cups water
1/4 cup Passover olive oil juice of 4-6 lemons
4 cloves garlic
1 bay leaf celery top
1 tsp. Passover thyme sprig of fennel
1 tsp. salt
1/2 tsp. white pepper
sprig parsley
1 lb. asparagus, sliced
6 leeks, sliced
6 zucchini, sliced
8 carrots, sliced
12-16 small onions
3 fennel heads, quartered

Combine all ingredients except vegetables and bring to a boil. Boil for 5 minutes. Add vegetables and lower heat. Cook until vegetables are tender but crisp.

Cool. Remove garlic and chill. Serves 8.

Great matzah ball debate a staple of Passover

By ALLYN RICKMAN
Special to The CJN

As Passover approaches each year and I begin to think about shopping lists and seder menus, my thoughts go back to the Passovers I spent as a child in Brooklyn.

We did not live in Brooklyn, our home was Torrington, Conn. but my maternal grandparents, my bubbie and zayde, lived a couple of blocks from Pitkin Avenue. Each year, my mother, sister and I, stayed with them for the whole week of Passover. My father, busy with his neighborhood drug store, was only able to come to Brooklyn for the seders.

One of my most persistent memories is the annual Great Matzah Ball debate! I probably remember this so vividly because I am the cook in our house and I make the matzah balls.

The two main advocates were my mother, on the side of light as a feather and her sister, my aunt Sarah, on the side of solid, heavy, rib-sticking, or as some of my cousins called them, golfballs. Both my mother and Aunt Sarah were great cooks but they definitely disagreed on matzah balls.

Since my bubbie also favored light as a feather, most matzah balls each Passover were wispy, but my aunt always brought some of hers to the seder for those who agreed with her and so the debate continued. There never was a resolution, and as I look back with the eyes of an adult, I guess they never wanted to resolve it — it had become a part of our seders.

As my mother's son, I am a proponent of light as a feather and so the recipes that follow are for those. I have however, taken matzah balls one step further, a step that my mother and aunt would probably have viewed with skepticism. I make flavored matzah balls.

I started this practice some years ago when I thought of adding dill to matzah balls. I tried it, the seder participants liked it, and a new tradition was born. To be on the safe side, I made plain matzah balls as well and gave everyone their choice. The next year I added a new choice, garlic and the next year nuts! Even before the soup bowls were cleared last year I began thinking of other flavorings — cinnamon, thyme, fennel, even, in a flight of wild imagination, cayenne. I quickly came to my senses. Offering all those choices, taking orders as I served the soup and being kidded by all would be too much.

I now make three kinds — plain, dill and garlic — a few weeks in advance and freeze them. I put the freshly-made matzah balls on

Kosher alcohol products

The LCBO is offering more than 40 kosher products, in time for Passover.

Now available at selected LCBO stores are red, white and rose table wines and sparkling wines from Israel, France, California and New York State. There are also liqueurs, grape brandy, slivovitz, and flavored and dessert wines. Prices for these products range from $6.45 to $20.90 for wines, and up to $25.10 for spirits.

Premium quality kosher-for-Passover wines include: Barons Edmond Benjamin de Rothschild Haut-Medoc 1993 at $34.95; Herzog Selection Beaujolais Villages at $16.95; and Baron Herzog Sonoma County Zinfandel at $17.75. These wines are only available in limited quantities at selected Toronto-area stores.

"Kosher products, like many other LCBO categories, are changing to reflect the tastes and interests of a more sophisticated buying public," says Randi Landy, LCBO category analyst, who oversees the purchase of Kosher products for the LCBO.

The majority of the kosher-for-Passover products have already arrived at selected LCBO stores. Consumers can also order Kosher products, based on availability, from any LCBO store across Ontario at no extra cost. LCBO unit sales for kosher products sold during Passover 1996 rose by 4.4 percent over the previous year.

Kosher-for-Passover products are now available at the following LCBO stores in the GTA:

• Metropolitan Toronto — 381 Wilson Ave.; 55 Bloor St. W.; 2512 Bayview Ave.; 908 St. Clair Ave. W.; 221 Wilmington Ave., Bathurst Manor Plaza, Downsview; 2 Cooper St. at Queens Quay Blvd.; First Canadian Place, Lower Concourse Level; 2901 Bayview Ave., Bayview Village Mall, Willowdale; 6 Yorkdale Shopping Centre; 5995 Yonge St.

• Richmond Hill — 9737 Yonge St., Richmond Centre Plaza.

Thornhill — 8129 Yonge St., Bayview Mews.

Add some flavor to matzah balls

cookie trays that have been covered first with paper toweling and then with wax paper with a few holes punched. I put the trays in the freezer for a few hours until the matzah balls are solid and then transfer them to air-tight freezer bags to store until Passover. The dill ones are easily recognizable with their green flecks, but the plain and garlic look identical, so I put a toothpick in each garlic ball before freezing for later identification.

PLAIN MATZOH BALLS

For dry ingredients:
½ cup matzoh meal
1 tsp. garlic salt (or to taste)
⅛ tsp. ground white pepper, or to taste
For liquid ingredients:
2 eggs well beaten
2 tbsp. melted rendered chicken fat* (you may use vegetable oil)
2 tbsp. plain seltzer

Mix together dry ingredients. Beat eggs and chicken fat together. Combine dry and liquid ingredients, mix well, add seltzer, mix well, cover and place in freezer for 20 minutes.

In a large pot, bring 3 quarts of water to a rolling boil. Roll the matzah ball mixture to the size of walnuts, drop in the boiling water, cover, reduce heat slightly to maintain a medium boil and cook for 35 to 40 minutes. Remove matzah balls with a slotted spoon and either freeze or, if using immediately, place in warm chicken soup to stay moist and warm.

For flavored matzah balls:
DILL: add 2 tsp. finely chopped fresh dill to the liquid before combining.
NUTS: add 2 tsp. finely chopped nuts (toasted almonds or toasted hazelnuts) to the dry mixture before combining.
GARLIC: add 1 tsp. finely chopped fresh garlic to the liquid before combining.

For other herbs, add 1 tsp. finely chopped fresh herb (or ⅛ tsp. dry herb) to the liquid before combining. For dry seasonings (cinnamon, nutmeg or whatever), add 1 tsp. to dry mixture before combining.

* Even in these times of fat avoidance, I use rendered chicken fat (schmaltz) for matzah balls. Rendered chicken fat is available at most supermarkets and kosher markets. It freezes well. Vegetable oil is a satisfactory substitute. Makes 6-8 matzah balls.

Passover Foods

Flavorful meals include orange turkey, fudge brownies

By NAOMI ARBIT
Special to The CJN

ORANGE TURKEY BREAST

1 turkey breast; if frozen, thaw, rinse and dry well garlic powder, pepper, ground ginger to taste
1 cup orange marmalade
1 6-oz. can orange juice concentrate thawed
6 oz. dried apricots
¾ cup golden and dark raisins mixed
2 onions
3 carrots, cut diagonally
1½ cups dry white Passover wine

Sprinkle seasonings on the inside of the turkey breast. Place the turkey in a large roasting pan. Spread top of turkey with marmalade, and pour the orange concentrate over the turkey. Place the apricots, raisins, onions and carrots around the turkey. Add the wine to the pan.

Roast the turkey for about 1½ hours in a 350-degree oven, basting every 30 minutes. It is a good idea to insert a meat thermometer into the thickest part of the breast. Cook breast until it has an internal temperature of 185 degrees. If the top gets too brown before it is done, cover loosely with greased foil. Make sure that there is liquid on the bottom of the pan, adding more wine if needed.

Let the turkey stand about 20 minutes before slicing. To serve, place the sliced meat over the vegetables and sauce, or serve the sauce separately.

A 5½-pound turkey breast serves 6 to 8 people.

VEGETABLE KUGEL

6 cups coarsely grated zucchini
2 tbsp. vegetable oil
3 cups finely chopped onion
3 cloves garlic, minced
3 cups grated carrot
3 eggs or Passover egg substitute
1½ cups matzah meal
Salt and freshly ground pepper to taste
Vegetable oil for baking pan
Sour cream or yogurt (optional)

Place the grated zucchini in a colander and sprinkle with ½ teaspoon salt and let stand for 15 minutes. Squeeze out all excess moisture and set aside.

Heat oil in a skillet over medium heat. Add onion, ½ teaspoon salt and saute about 10 minutes or until onion is soft. Add garlic and saute 2 minutes longer. Remove from heat. In a bowl, mix together zucchini, sauteed onion and grated carrot. Beat in eggs and matzah meal. Add some pepper and mix well.

Oil a 13 x 9-inch baking pan. Spoon in batter, spread and bake in a 375-degree oven for 1 hour or until firm. Cut into squares and serve with sour cream or yogurt, if desired.

FUDGY BROWNIES

4 oz. unsweetened chocolate
½ cup margarine (pareve)
2 cups sugar
4 eggs
1 cup matzah cake meal
1 tbsp. Passover brandy
⅛ tsp. salt
½ cup chopped walnuts

In a saucepan, melt chocolate and margarine over low heat. In a mixing bowl, stir together slightly cooled chocolate mixture and sugar. Beat in eggs, one at a time, with an electric mixer on medium speed. Stir in matzah meal, brandy and salt. Stir in nuts.

Pour into a greased 9 x 9 x 2-inch baking pan. Bake in a 350-degree oven for 30 minutes. Cool. Cut into 16 bars.

PEAR CRISP (cholesterol-free)

4½ cups peeled, cored, thinly sliced pears (or other fruit)
1 tbsp. lemon juice
1 tsp. grated lemon rind
2-4 tbsp. sugar, as desired (or sugar substitute)
1 tbsp. potato starch
Dash of cinnamon (optional)
Topping:
1¼ cups matzah meal
¼ cup sugar or sugar substitute
1 tbsp. potato starch
½ tsp. cinnamon
¼ cup chopped walnuts
6 tbsp. melted margarine

In a bowl, combine the pears, lemon juice and rind. Combine sugar, potato starch and cinnamon, and add to the pear mixture. Spoon mixture into a non-stick sprayed 8-inch square pan.

In another bowl, combine the matzah meal, sugar, cinnamon and nuts. Cut in the margarine until the mixture is crumbly. Sprinkle the topping over the pear mixture.

Bake the pear crisp in a 350-degree oven for 45 minutes.

BETTER THAN MACAROONS

1 egg white
1 cup ground almonds
½ cup superfine sugar
1½ tsp. cinnamon

Beat egg whites until stiff. Beat in sugar. Stir in almonds and cinnamon. With wet hands, form into 16 balls and place on a non-stick (vegetable) sprayed cookie sheet. Bake in a 325-degree oven for 20 minutes. Cool on rack. Store in an airtight container for one week or in the freezer for a few months.

CHOCOLATE CAKE

½ cup butter, cut into small pieces
8 oz. bittersweet chocolate, cut into small pieces
5 large eggs, separated
Dash of salt
¾ cup sugar
Whipped topping and/or raspberry sauce to garnish

Raspberry Sauce:
2 10-oz. packages frozen raspberries, thawed
¼ cup sugar, or to taste
1 tsp. fresh lemon juice
Purée all ingredients in a blender or processor and chill.

Using a non-stick vegetable spray or butter, grease and lightly dust with potato starch a 10-inch round cake pan. Melt chocolate and butter in a double boiler or microwave, stirring occasionally. In a large mixing bowl, beat egg yolks, salt and all but 3 tablespoons of the sugar. Stir in the melted chocolate mixture.

With an electric mixer, beat egg whites on medium speed until soft peaks form. Gradually beat in the 3 tablespoons sugar and beat until stiff but not dry. Stir one-quarter of the whites into the chocolate mixture to lighten it. Fold in the remaining whites. Pour into prepared pan.

Bake in a 325-degree oven 1 hour and 15 minutes or until toothpick inserted into centre of cake comes out clean. Immediately turn cake out onto a rack. As cake cools, the centre will sink and crack. Serve with whipped topping and/or raspberry sauce.

Yom Ha'atzmaut Cartoon Contest

We are seeking cartoons dealing with the subject of Israel. In particular, we are looking for cartoons that have artistic and intellectual merit and which tastefully convey one of the many truths about life in Israel. They may be funny, serious, satiric or cute.

Who can enter: Adults and teenagers are eligible.

How to enter: You may submit as many entries as you like. The judges will choose cartoons that are well-illustrated, clever and tasteful. Two cartoons will be selected from the teenage cartoonists; two will be selected from the remaining submissions. The cartoons must be drawn in black and white. Please write your name, age, address and phone number on the back of your submission.

You may mail or deliver your submission to: CJN Community Contests, The Canadian Jewish News, 1500 Don Mills Rd., Suite 205, North York, Ont., M3B 3K4. If you want us to return the cartoon, please provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope. Otherwise, we will be unable to do so.

The contest closes at 5 p.m. onWednesday, April 30, 1997.

Prizes: The "winners" will be published in The CJN and each cartoonist will receive $25. The judges' decisions will be final. The odds of winning depend upon the number and the quality of submissions received.

How the winners will be notified: The winning cartoonists will be notified by telephone before Shabbat on Friday, May 2, 1997.

When the prizes will be awarded: The winning submissions will be published in The CJN of May 8, 1997. Cheques will be sent shortly afterwards. We look forward to receiving your entries.

Any litigation respecting the conduct and awarding of a prize in this contest may be submitted to the Régie des Loteries et courses du Québec.

Avoid favorite menu trap

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

Long hours of deliberation and work go into making Shabbat meals sumptuous. The tastiness of the meal can set the mood for the entire day so, of course, we want everything to be perfect.

We're all guilty of falling into the favorite menu trap. What we look for, besides a new way to fix chicken or brisket, are new and exciting side dishes to spice up routine meals. A great side dish has to be easy, tasty, have the ability to be pareve or dairy, and be able to stay hot or cold if services run long.

INSTANT PICKLES PEPPERS AND POTATOES

4 cucumbers, sliced half-inch thick
1½ lbs. red skin potatoes
1 red pepper, sliced
1 green pepper, sliced
1 yellow pepper, sliced
1½ cups Passover vinegar
3½ cups water
2 tbsp. salt
4 tsp. sugar
1 sliced onion
3 to 4 cloves garlic
3 sprigs fresh dill
Salt
Pepper
Dried dill

Place potatoes in medium size pot, cover with water and cook until tender. Remove from heat, drain, cool and cut in half. Cover with damp cloth and refrigerate. Wash and slice all vegetables and set aside. In medium sized stock pot combine all remaining ingredients and bring to a boil. Add vegetables and boil for 5 minutes. Remove from heat, let cool and refrigerate. Drain cold vegetables, saving the liquid (it can be used again). Combine vegetables and potatoes and season with a little salt, pepper, and dried dill. Serves 8 to 10.

ZUCCHINI NICOISE

2 tbsp. oil
1 medium onion sliced thin
½-lb. fresh mushrooms, sliced
1 cup chopped tomatoes
Fresh pepper
½ bay leaf
3 zucchini cut into 1-inch pieces

In large skillet, over medium heat, sauté onions and mushrooms in oil. Cook until onions are transparent. Add tomatoes and spices and simmer until tender, approximately 10 minutes. Add zucchini to sauce, cover and simmer for about 10 minutes. This can be served hot or cold and can be made into a main course by adding grilled tuna or salmon. Serves 4 to 6.

Sulphite-free red wines introduced

The Kedem/Royal Wine Corporation recently announced the addition of a sulphite-free wine to their line of traditional Concord wines.

The new product, called Ruby-Red Concord Wine, is the result of many years of research and development on the part of the Royal Wine Corporation.

The sulphite-free Ruby-Red is unique, said a news release. Virtually all wines and grape juices have slight amounts of sulphur dioxide added to preserve freshness. For a vast majority of wine consumers, this poses no problems. However, for a small minority, even minute amounts of sulphur-dioxide can cause discomfort or illness.

"It is for these consumers that Ruby-Red has been created," according to a statement released by Phillip Herzog, the senior vice-president of the Royal Wine Corporation.

Much of the work associated with producing the sulphite-free Ruby-Red is credited to Michael Herzog, Kedem's chief winemaker and eighth-generation descendant of the Herzog wine-making family.

Ruby-Red, like all Kedem Concord grape products, was produced in the ultra-modern, strictly quality-controlled winery located upstate in Marlboro, N.Y.

Knesset to debate conversion bill

By LIAT COLLINS AND HAIM SHAPIRO
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Barring a last-minute compromise, the Knesset was expected this week to hear the first reading of the conversion bill, which would restrict recognition for conversions to Judaism in Israel to those approved by the Chief Rabbinate.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu told an Anti-Defamation League delegation he would "never allow a move that would delegitimize Reform or Conservative Judaism."

Netanyahu said he would rather let his government collapse than negate conversions performed abroad. However, he criticized what he said was an effort to change the status quo, under which non-Orthodox conversions performed abroad had been accepted, but not those done in Israel. He said there was a great deal of disinformation being spread among American Jewry regarding the conversion issue.

Several Knesset factions were to hold meetings on the bill before the vote. Jewish Agency chair Avraham Burg was to have met separately with the opposition and coalition to discuss the agency's opposition.

Meretz leader Yossi Sarid is demanding that the Knesset also vote on a bill recognizing non-Orthodox streams of Judaism. Tsomet is demanding the bill contain a clause stating that Israel recognizes non-Orthodox conversions performed abroad. One version of the bill, favored by the religious parties, would not recognize even these.

MKs Ze'ev Begin (Likud) and Alex Lubotzky (Third Way) are calling on the religious parties to continue talks on a possible compromise solution and back down from their demand that there be a vote this week.

Compromise solution

The religious parties are demanding the bill be raised now, because the High Court of Justice has given the attorney general until April 30 to reply to a petition to recognize a number of Conservative conversions of adopted children. The Knesset goes into recess at the end of this week and will not reconvene until May.

Lubotzky has met with coalition leaders to present his proposal that all converts be registered as Jews on their identity cards, while the Interior Ministry's Population Registry would record the type of conversion. However, the religious parties refused to postpone the vote.

The Conservative and Reform movements were to hold a demonstration and prayer meeting opposite the Knesset this week in opposition to the bill.

Politicians target end to direct elections

By SARAH HONIG
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — A number of prominent Likud and Labor party figures announced last week the formation of an extra-parliamentary group that will work to repeal the law for the direct election of the prime minister.

The group will be headed by the Likud's Moshe Arens. Also taking part from the Likud is former minister Moshe Nissim and MK Uzi Landau. Labor is represented by MKs Yossi Beilin, Ephraim Sneh and Moshe Shahal.

The direct election law came into effect last summer. It was backed by Yitzhak Rabin and opposed by Shimon Peres.

The Likud was against direct elections, but Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu didn't follow the party line and voted for it in the last Knesset.

"The direct election system is dangerous and even many of those who had ardently campaigned for it are now changing their minds," Arens said.

Beilin said "the direct election law is one of the most terrible and utterly misleading pieces of legislation ever passed by the Knesset. It is anti-democratic."

MANISCHEWITZ
WHAT'S NEW FOR PASSOVER?
White Grape Matzo, Grape Matzo Crackers, Slice & Serve Gefilte Fish Loaf in a jar, and Banana Split Macaroons are all new for Passover. And the perfect touch for a memorable Seder, traditional Manischewitz Concord Grape Wine. All made with love from your Manischewitz family.

SPICE-NUT SPONGE CAKE

12-ounce package Manischewitz Passover Sponge Cake Mix
2 tsp. cinnamon ¼ tsp. ginger
¼ cup Manischewitz Concord Select Wine
6 eggs
¼ cup coarsely chopped walnuts

Add cinnamon and ginger to Sponge Cake Mix. Bake cake as directed on Sponge Cake box substituting ¼ cup Manischewitz Concord Select Wine for water. Also, add chopped nuts when folding in egg whites.

WINE SAUCE FOR DESSERTS

¾ cup sugar
2 tablespoons Manischewitz Potato Starch
¼ tsp. salt ½ cup water
1 cup Manischewitz Concord Select Wine
1 teaspoon lemon juice
1 cup pineapple chunks or fruit cocktail, drained

Combine first three ingredients in a small saucepan. Gradually blend in the water. Cook over moderate heat until thick, stirring constantly. Gradually blend in the wine and lemon juice. cook about 2 minutes longer or until thickened again. Cool. Add drained pineapple chunks or fruit cocktail. Spoon over Spice-Nut Sponge Cake slices. Or, use the Wine Sauce over your favorite ice cream, cake, or other dessert.

PASSOVER CHOCOLATE MOUSSE CAKE

1 (10 ounce) Can Manischewitz macaroons, sliced
1/4 cup Manischewitz Concord Select Wine
8 ounces Semi-sweet chocolate
3 Egg yolks
4 Egg whites
3 Tablespoons Sugar
3 Tablespoons Coffee or water

Line bottom and sides of greased 8" spring form pan with ½ sliced macaroons. Dip remaining macaroons in Manischewitz Concord Select Wine and set aside.

Melt chocolate. Combine egg yolks, sugar and coffee (or water). Slowly blend chocolate into egg yolk mixture. Beat egg whites until stiff but not dry. Fold egg whites into cooled chocolate mixture. Pour half of chocolate mixture into macaroon lined pan. Add wine soaked macaroons. Add remaining chocolate mixture and refrigerate 2 to 3 hours, or until set. To serve, unmold and garnish with a few macaroons, chocolate curls or dessert whip. Makes 6-8 servings.

PM warns of 'virtual collapse of peace process'

• Israel will be asked to stop taking unilateral steps while the negotiations are continuing. The United States may ask Israel to freeze the construction work at Har Choma as the talks continue.

• Accelerated implementation of other aspects of the self-rule accords will be called for, including opening a Palestinian airport and seaport in Gaza and creating a safe route passage for Palestinians travelling between the West Bank and the Gaza Strip.

Meanwhile, despite earlier fears, Land Day protests in the main Israeli Arab towns and villages passed quietly, prompting Public Security Minister Avigdor Kahalani to praise Israeli Arab leaders for maintaining order.

Netanyahu had appealed to Israeli Arabs to shun violence during the annual protest day, which marks the 1976 killing by Israeli security forces of six Israeli Arabs protesting against land expropriations in the Galilee.

In the West Bank, however, violent protests continued and the IDF stationed tanks and reinforcements around the major West Bank towns to prevent an escalation of the violence.

The most serious clashes took place around Nablus, Jenin and Hebron, where dozens of Arabs were wounded by rubber bullets fired by Israeli troops in an effort to disperse the protesters.

In Nablus, Palestinian police set up barricades and fired into the air to prevent demonstrators from charging Joseph's Tomb, where an Israeli military unit was stationed.

Skirmishes were also reported near Rachel's Tomb outside Bethlehem and in Ramallah, where Palestinian police reportedly used clubs to disperse hundreds of protesters surging toward an Israeli army roadblock.

In a related incident, Palestinians bearing anti-Israel banners took part last Sunday in the funeral procession of Abdullah Khalil Salah, a 21-year-old Palestinian student killed in clashes the previous day in Ramallah. The funeral took place in Salah's hometown of Beit Sahur, which is located near Har Choma.

The IDF was investigating the cause of his death. Palestinians charged that he had been killed by live ammunition; Israeli officials said the soldiers were using rubber bullets.

In addition, Foreign Minister David Levy's office said the European Union's Middle East peace envoy, Miguel Angel Moratinos, had delivered a message to him from Arafat in which the Palestinian leader pledged to do his best to curb violence.

Nabil Abu Irdeineh, speaking for Arafat, said Israel must implement its commitments in the peace accords and return to the negotiations without any preconditions.

In Cairo, Arab foreign ministers adopted a resolution last Sunday calling on the 22-member Arab League to abide by the Arab boycott of Israel, in retaliation for the Jewish state's decision to start construction at Har Choma. In recent years, several Arab states have eased the boycott in recognition of Israeli-Palestinian peace moves.

The resolution, which will be presented to the governments of each of the ministers, also calls on Arab states to stop all normalization of ties with Israel, to close Israeli offices and missions in their countries and to suspend the multilateral talks that deal with regional issues such as water, the environment and security.

The resolution was not expected to affect Israel's peace treaties with Egypt and Jordan.

Mar. 24

• Appearing in a Tel Aviv court, Margalit Har-Shefi pleaded innocent to charges that she was aware of the plot to kill Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin but failed to notify authorities. Her trial will be held in May.

• An Israeli art dealer is seeking permission from Belarus to buy the house that Marc Chagall was born in. He would like to dismantle it and bring it to Jerusalem for its possible use as a museum for Chagall's works.

Mar. 25

• The attorney-general ruled that four Palestinian offices in eastern Jerusalem should be closed because of alleged links to the Palestinian Authority.

• Israeli physician, Prof. Daniel Weinstein was scheduled to return to Jerusalem nine days after Moroccan police confiscated his passport to prevent his leaving the country. Weinstein, head of obstetrics at Hadassah Hospital in Jerusalem, was a key organizer of the First World Congress on Maternal Mortality, held in Marrakesh.

Mar. 26

• Two earthquakes shook northern Israel. No local damage was reported by the quakes, both of which were centred in Lebanon.

• Ori Orr, a Labor Knesset member and former deputy minister of defence, was chosen by the Jerusalem Journalists Association as the "most courteous" parliamentarian.

Mar. 27

• Shoul Eisenberg, chair of the Israel Corporation and one of the country's most influential industrialists, died in Beijing, of an apparent heart attack.

• Attorney-General Elyakim Rubinstein and State Attorney Edna Arbel met with the police team investigating the Bar-On affair. No date was given for the publication of the report on their investigations.

Mar. 28

• The media reported on the trial and reprimand of an IDF officer for racist behavior towards an Ethiopian soldier. Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu denounced the sentence as too lenient and called for a retrial.

U.S. envoy back in fireman's role

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Dennis Ross is back again in a depressingly familiar role, a fireman in diplomat's clothing. The U.S. special envoy to the Mideast returned to the region last week, trying to douse flames which are consuming the tottering edifice of the peace process.

Mideast Analysis

It was the second time in six months that President Bill Clinton had summoned Ross, a latter-day Henry Kissinger, to defuse a major crisis between Israel and the Palestine Authority (PA).

Ross, who was back in Washington this week after two days of fruitless deliberations, was previously in the Middle East in January to wrap up three months of protracted negotiations which finally produced the long-awaited Hebron agreement. He was called there following last September's unprecedented wave of fighting in the territories, which broke out on the heels of Israel's decision to open a second entrance to an archeological tunnel in East Jerusalem.

The challenge facing Ross today, almost three months after Israel's partial withdrawal from Hebron, is no less serious.

The peace process is frozen. Indeed, Benjamin Netanyahu says it has virtually collapsed. Netanyahu and Yasser Arafat are barely on speaking terms. The PA is no longer cooperating with Israel on security matters, and the Palestinians see no point in continuing peace talks unless Israel stops building settlements. And daily clashes pitting Palestinian youths against Israeli soldiers in the West Bank are further widening the gulf of animosity and mistrust.

The latest crisis, which has been accompanied by an escalation of charges and counter-charges levelled by Israel and the PA, stems from several interrelated factors: the announcement by Israel to build the Har Choma residential neighborhood in East Jerusalem over the vehement protests of the PA and the Arab world; the PA's dissatisfaction with Israel's offer to withdraw from only nine percent of Area B and Area C in what is supposed to be the first of three Israeli redeployments from the West Bank; the determination by Israel to close four Palestinian offices in eastern Jerusalem said to be directly affiliated with the PA; the anger in Israel over the March 21 suicide bombing in Tel Aviv which, Netanyahu claims, was indirectly orchestrated by Arafat, an accusation he staunchly denies.

The bombing has clearly worsened the situation, because peace and terrorism are irreconcilable. (Suicide bombers have claimed the lives of 133 civilians and soldiers since April 1994.)

In responding to the latest terrorist outrage, the Israeli government stopped short of suspending peace talks, but warned that their longevity would be in peril unless the PA "reins in" groups like Hamas and Islamic Jihad.

Last winter, in the wake of four suicide bombings which killed 63 people in Israel, the PA cracked down on Islamic militants hell bent on wrecking the Oslo accords. A year on, however, the PA is less willing to do so, largely because of its conviction that Israel is creating unilateral facts on the ground and thus violating the spirit of Oslo and pre-empting final status negotiations.

Israel disputes these accusations, but the tension over the meaning of the Oslo agreements has all but eroded the modicum of mutual trust between Netanyahu and Arafat.

Netanyahu has not only accused Arafat of giving Islamic radicals the "green light" to wreak havoc in Israel, but charged his Fatah faction in the PLO of organizing the violent confrontations in the West Bank. In addition, Israel has condemned the non-binding Arab League resolution recommending that member states suspend relations with Israel.

The PA, in turn, has accused Netanyahu of "trickery," of calculations "to ruin" the peace process and of bowing to "extremist religious parties" in his cabinet. "We don't have any faith left in the other side," Arafat recently told the Israeli daily Yediot Ahronot, in an admission which hardly bodes well for the future.

Dennis Ross, who plans to return to the Mideast soon with a plan to get the peace process back on track, certainly has his work cut out for him.

The fires are still burning.

Swiss oppose Jew as fund head

By FREDY ROM
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

ZURICH — At least one member of the Swiss cabinet is questioning whether a local Jewish leader should chair the body that will oversee disbursements from Switzerland's recently established Holocaust Memorial Fund.

Rolf Bloch, president of the Federation of Jewish Communities in Switzerland, confirmed that "it was the understanding" of Jewish leaders involved in the nomination process that he would serve as chairman of the seven-member executive board in charge of administering the fund.

But one member of the Swiss cabinet, Interior Minister Ruth Dreifuss, called for a meeting next week of fellow cabinet members to discuss the naming of Bloch to the top post of the fund's executive board.

Last week, the World Jewish Restitution Organization (WJRO), which can nominate three members for the executive board, said it had put forward its candidates: Elie Wiesel, Undersecretary of Commerce Stuart Eizenstat and Israeli Knesset member Avraham Herschson.

The Swiss cabinet, which has final approval of the nominees, will meet April 9 to discuss the list of proposed board members, according to a government spokesperson.

Dreifuss, who is Jewish, questioned the wisdom of appointing a "Jewish president for the fund's directing committee" in a private letter to Foreign Minister Flavio Cotti that was subsequently made public.

In the letter, Dreifuss requested that Bloch's appointment be discussed by all seven members of the Swiss cabinet, or federal council, which issues governmental decisions on the basis of a consensus of its ministers.

Dreifuss "was very upset that the content of her internal letter to Cotti was made public," Dominique Rueb, the minister's spokesperson, said in an interview.

"It is obvious that Ruth Dreifuss has nothing against Rolf Bloch as a person," Rueb added.

Swiss leaders, stung by mounting accusations about the country's handling of Jewish wartime deposits and its economic ties to Nazi Germany, are apparently sensitive about having a local Jewish leader chair the fund's executive committee.

According to one political analyst, Dreifuss is not alone in questioning Bloch's nomination.

"It is very clear that the nomination of a Swiss Jewish leader as president of the fund's directing committee is opposed by several members of the government," the analyst said.

Another nominee to the fund's executive board, Eizenstat, may also be opposed by the Swiss cabinet on the grounds that he is a high-ranking official of a foreign country.

The approval of a "U.S. government official by the Swiss government is a very delicate matter," according to a source within the government.

The Swiss cabinet formally approved the Holocaust Memorial Fund in February, after Switzerland's three largest banks announced that they would contribute to a fund to help needy survivors and their heirs.

The fund now totals some $190 million as a result of pledges made by the three banks, and from subsequent pledges made by the Swiss central bank and by several industrial giants.

The question of who would be in charge of distributing the funds was the subject of delicate negotiations between the Swiss government and the World Jewish Congress (WJC), which spearheaded an international campaign to compensate Holocaust survivors and their heirs who were unable to reclaim assets deposited in Swiss banks during World War II.

In late February, the two sides reached a compromise on representation whereby the foundation administering the fund would be run by a seven-member executive board.

According to the agreement, the board would include four "eminent Swiss persons," and three "eminent persons recommended by the WJRO," which was created in 1992 by the WJC, the Jewish Agency for Israel and other leading Jewish groups.

The object of the fund, the agreement says, "is to support persons in need who were persecuted for reasons of their race, religion or political views or for other reasons, or were otherwise victims of the Holocaust/Shoah, as well as to support their descendants in need."

Non-Jewish victims, including Gypsies, are also expected to receive compensation.

According to Jewish and Swiss officials, the fund is expected to make its first payments in the summer.

The fund was created in an effort to provide immediate relief to needy victims of the Holocaust while investigations continue here into the whereabouts of Jewish assets deposited in Swiss banks during the war.

Needy Holocaust victims who receive payments from the fund will still be eligible to regain those assets once the investigation concludes.

Eating disorders more common among Jews

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jews appear to suffer from eating disorders at almost double the rate of the general population, Dr. Leora Pinhas told a standing-room audience at a recent program sponsored by York University's Jewish Student Federation.

Pinhas, a child and adolescent psychiatrist at the Hospital for Sick Children (HSC) and York County Hospital, as well as a research fellow at HSC, noted that these findings, which are also found among Catholics, appear equally in Orthodox and secular Jews.

She said a study is being started in high schools to try to find out the reasons.

It seems the findings are more prevalent in cultures where there are high expectations to achieve, and to conform to society's views on appearance.

"It is seen to be necessary to be thin to be well-thought of," she said, noting that a law clerk who had stood first in her class was told being thin was considered a sign of being in control, and thus able to do well in law.

She also said that matchmakers in the Orthodox community report that young men looking for wives demand women who are thin.

Pinhas said that anorexia, defined as not eating enough to maintain weight and the cessation of menses, has a 10 percent fatality rate. "It is found in one percent of the population, the same as schizophrenia. But it is one of the few psychiatric diseases where people die."

Bulemia, where a person forces herself to purge, has an even worse outlook, with a 20 percent mortality rate.

Even if the person does not die, there are serious health problems, such as osteoporosis and heart disease, she said.

Andy Lichtman, a 19-year-old York University student, told of her seven-year struggle with anorexia. It began, she said, with comments like "you would be so pretty if you would only lose weight."

When she was lavishly praised because she did lose weight, "I thought if I am getting compliments now, what if I lost more." She joined a health club, exercised more and more, and ate less and less.

She recalled how she pushed away her friends and family, lied about eating, skipped school and finally wound up in the hospital.

"They told me I could either eat, or be put on intravenous feeding."

It was then she realized that "I had to decide if I would get better or not. Until I decided I wanted help, I couldn't be helped."

Even though she decided to eat, it was a long, slow, painful process.

"All I could think about was food. The only books and movies I was interested in were about food. I couldn't focus on anything else."

Even now, "every bite is a battle. I refuse to ever skip a meal — I won't go back. I realize that if I did it once [stop eating] I could do it again."

During the question period, the audience hotly protested the emphasis on outward appearance and thinness in magazines, advertising and even in the schools. Pinhas agreed with suggestions that purchasing power is a strong weapon, and said things might change if people didn't buy magazines and products which stressed thinness.

"We are not victims here," said Pinhas. "We have a huge voice."

An audience member, saying that her sister is anorexic, objected to the emphasis on society's obsession with appearance as the cause of eating disorders.

"It is a matter of control — they feel that the only control they have in their lives is what goes into their mouths."

Pinhas agreed, but questioned why they chose to express their feelings through eating.

"It is also a matter of finding it difficult to cope with how hard it is to be an adolescent. You get so sick that you don't have to cope anymore."

Pinhas, Lichtman and many in the audience slammed the provincial government cutbacks, which they said are making it harder to get proper treatment.

Children In Israel

MINNIE MOUSE IN JERUSALEM

Israeli children think very carefully about their Purim costumes. This year, the traditional costumes of Mordechai, Esther, Haman and King Achashverosh were up against stiff competition from the secular world of Batman, Spiderman, and Disney. Especially popular were the Lion King, Pocahantas, and the perennial favorites, Mickey and Minnie Mouse. Seen in this photo is an obviously delighted young Minnie Mouse strolling with her umbrella on Ben Yehuda Street in Jerusalem.

HELLO...HELLO...IS ANYONE LISTENING?

This young boy is playing outside his temporary home in Givat Hamatos. He and his family are waiting for their permanent home to be ready for them, hopefully, some time soon. Their temporary home is a trailer home. In Israel it is called a "caravan." [Israel photo]

Stories of Elijah

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Everyone I know spends part of the seder staring at Elijah's cup, hoping to see the contents go down.

According to tradition, the prophet Elijah comes to every seder in the world and takes a sip from the cup set aside for him. We invite him to join the seder in the hope that he will soon announce the coming of the Messiah.

Elijah is a very popular character, and countless legends are told about him. Many are found in The Mysterious Visitor; stories of the Prophet Elijah, by Nina Jaffe (Scholastic Press, 1997).

One famous story is about a poor man who is told by Elijah to go to a distant town to find his fortune. While there, the man discovers that his fortune lies, literally, in his own backyard.

Another is about a young boy who dreams that his life would be perfect if he only had another job – and finally finds that happiness lies in being himself.

Still another tells of a man who discovers that the spirit of Elijah lives in those who are kind and compassionate to others.

Elivia Savadier has created exquisite illustrations for The Mysterious Visitor, full of beautiful colors; many are dream-like and full of humor.

This would be a wonderful book for children to read while their parents are preparing for Pesach. Then they can tell their friends and relatives at the seder some of the stories of the great Elijah.

Step into spring with Mephisto

As winter draws to a close, and blades of grass peep shyly up from the ground, most of us will spend more time outdoors. As the weather grows warm, we come out of hibernation, put off our heavy winter garments, maybe even dream of summer.

And what do we do outdoors? The major North American exercise is walking — especially for business and professional people, whose work involves little physical labor. Walking, because it uses the whole body without excessive strain, is one of the best all-round forms of exercise.

Taking a single step is a remarkable process. We extend one foot, lean forward from the hip, extend the knee, then balance our whole weight on this leg so the other can make the corresponding motion — all the while moving back, shoulders, neck and arms; and we do this thousands of times a day.

Not only does your foot bear all your weight each time you take a step, important nerves also link the feet with other organs; so healthy feet bode well for a healthy body. As your feet probably spend most of each day in shoes, the footwear you buy will affect your health in turn.

If you want shoes designed and crafted according to the best available knowledge, Mephisto is for you. Who wouldn't want to wear the world's number one walking shoe?

Mephisto shoes, boots and sandals are attractively styled in rich earth tones. They are durable, and hand-finished entirely from high-quality leather, rubber, cork, and other natural materials which shape themselves to your feet and gait.

Every model incorporates a latex foam midsole for tireless walking (it makes rugged ground seem like a thick, soft carpet); latex padding to protect heel and joints from pressure and rubbing; and a leather inner sock.

Mephisto offers footwear for every purpose, casual or formal; but as the weather warms up, you'll be thinking about walking shoes, walking sandals, and trekking shoes for light hiking.

Mephisto especially recommends the Trampolins model. The Trampolins features a protective mudguard and cleated sole for maximum grip on wet surfaces; a heel designed for maximum shock absorption; and a simple method of speed lacing.

While popular in their native France, Mephisto shoes find 85% of their market elsewhere in Europe, North America and Asia. Worn by celebrities everywhere, they are gaining popularity daily. In Toronto, you will find a large selection of Trampolins and other models at two Mephisto Boutiques (50 Bloor Street West, Concourse level, 416-966-2568 and 1177 Yonge Street at Summerhill, 416-968-7026); and at a Mephisto "Shop in Shop" (182 Main Street, Unionville, 905-940-0865).

Ralph Benisty, Mephisto's Director of Operations for Canada, will be only too happy to answer any specific questions you may have about any item in the Mephisto product line. You can reach him at (905) 881-0050.

GLATT KOSHER CERTIFIED KOSHER BY THE RABBINICAL VA'AD HAKASHRUTH, KASHRUTH COUNCIL OF TORONTO.

There's No Place Like A New Home: Singles Registry Memberships On The Rise

Registration has jumped a whopping 30% since Toronto's largest Jewish dating service settled in to its new home. That's the word from Jewish Singles Registry director Rob Singer. After four and a half years in the B'nai Brith building on Hove St. the J.S.R. recently moved its headquarters to 55 Eglinton Ave. East #405, just east of Yonge St. The new premises are more than double the size and offers members a new level of privacy and confidentiality virtually unparalleled by any other dating service in the city.

What sets the J.S.R. apart from all other services is its successful approach to dating. "J.S.R. members are the one's that control the whole dating process" says Singer. "They get to choose for themselves who they would like to meet by viewing detailed biography/profiles, see photographs, and now exclusive to the J.S.R., they get to hear pre-recorded voice personal messages. You want to know as much as possible about a person before you meet them. The J.S.R. process let's you do that and more."

Personal Service

Besides from putting the member in control of the dating process, the J.S.R. has risen to a new level of personalized service. Members have the opportunity of discussing their selections with Registry staff, and if they wish to have feedback after the date, all they have to do is request it.

Fast, Safe, Reliable

Perhaps one of the most exciting features of the J.S.R. is how fast the process works. Most new J.S.R. members are usually dating within a week or two of joining the service. "That's my favourite part of the business" admits Singer. "People register with us because it is very difficult to meet other Jewish singles. Usually within a couple of days, they are already making plans to go out."

Another advantage of joining the J.S.R. is that each new applicant is initially screened before being allowed access to the database. Personal indentification must be provided at time of registration, otherwise the person will not be allowed entry into the service.

Open House For New Members

If you have NEVER been to a dating service before, here is your perfect opportunity to drop by the Jewish Singles Registry and see for yourself how the system works. An open house is scheduled for Sunday, April 13, 1997, from 1-4 p.m. You will be able to meet the entire Registry staff, as well as read selected profiles of actual members, see their photographs and hear their recorded voice personal messages. The afternoon promises to be, educational, informative and fun.

More To Come

A lot of exciting changes have occurred recently at the J.S.R. and Singer promises that the new office and new sophisticated computer system are just the beginning. Whether you are looking to meet someone for friendship, a relationship, or marriage, the time is right to sign up with the Jewish Singles Registry. They can be reached at (416) 483-4151 or e-mail at jsreg@total.net.

At The Greens Of Uplands, home is in the details

Traditionally, the common phrase "all the comforts of home" referred primarily to the house and its atmosphere inside, maybe also the yard. More and more today, though, when a thoughtful home buyer contemplates a purchase, the neighbourhood or community has a high priority.

Are you looking for an upscale home, with features that unite comfort, fine styling and good workmanship - in a neighbourhood with all the urban amenities, yet surrounded by natural beauty? If so, then the Greens of Uplands is for you.

The builder, Broadway Homes, is a family-owned Bratty company, with three generations of experience and expertise in building elegant residences, and long-standing records for excellent after-sales service.

Broadway Homes' newest community, the Greens of Uplands, fills a higher-income niche in the residential market; its uniquely elegant designs will appeal to the most discriminating buyer. The Greens combines prestige with convenience, accessibility with privacy - and most important of all, quality with value.

At Bathurst and Centre St. in Thornhill, the Greens of Uplands enjoys an exclusive ridgetop location in a green, wooded landscape. It is a golf-course community bordering the east Don River, the Thornhill Golf and Country Club, and the Uplands golf course (which contains a ski hill in the winter).

The Greens of Uplands is minutes away from schools (North York Montessori School, Leo Baeck, Ner Israel Yeshiva, Kamin Education Centre), parks, recreation facilities, shopping and cultural centres, and synagogues (Beth Avraham Yoseph Synagogue, B'nai Shalom Congregation and Day Nursery, Temple Kol Ami and Netivot HaTorah).

With over 100 homes, the Greens of Uplands is large enough to form a distinctive neighbourhood, yet small enough to be friendly. The spacious lots range from 50' wide up to 1/2 acre; most are 60' wide. There is a substantial custom features list for the 60' lots; some of these features are also available for the 50' lots.

Designed both for elegance and lasting value, the Greens of Uplands homes are all-brick, with optional stone and stucco upgrade fronts. There are 18 exceptional bungalow and 2 storey and 3 storey designs, in sizes from 2,000 sq. ft. up to 4,847.

Homes on lots from 60' up include these standard features: 9' ceilings on the main floor; flared 4x4 skylights; cornice moulding on the main floor and upper hallway; high archways with oversized trim; glazed transoms over some interior doors; 60 oz. broadloom; dining room with coffered ceiling; and halogen lights throughout.

The kitchens feature valence lighting with 4 way dome ceiling, higher cabinets with crown moulding, upper corner cabinets with glass doors, built-in electric cooktop, and oven with microwave and wine rack where possible.

An open staircase to the basement leads to a finished landing. The basement itself is spacious enough for you to finish for use as rec room, bar, in-law apartment, office or workshop. Other features include central air conditioning, complete vacuum system, and security system with view camera.

In attending to all the small details which add comfort and elegance to the solidity of good construction, Broadway Homes has been meticulous. Every particular has been thought of - right down to the brass lever handles on interior doors, and the higher-than-usual 5 1/4" baseboard trim.

Seen from outside, the Greens of Uplands homes are as fine as the interiors. The exteriors feature half-round elliptical transoms over vinyl casement windows; and distinctive gable and cottage rooflines mark these homes as the best residential designs in the area.

But no matter how a building will look on site once all the finishing touches are in place, traditional blueprints or scale models are hard to evaluate. How does your imagination make the leap from drawing or model to the life-sized reality?

To show you what your residence will really look like, Broadway is pioneering North America's most comprehensive, up-to-date form of presentation: computer simulations, with virtual 3 D walk-throughs of fully furnished homes. Right down to the standard exterior colour packages and the angle of light falling through the windows on the interior, the simulation is complete.

If this sounds like your kind of home, in the kind of neighbourhood you want to live in, Broadway Homes is waiting for your call. To arrange to view your future Greens of Uplands residence, call Abe or Francis Wang at 905-881-3154.

Artist expresses psychic, metaphysical ideas

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Although his father designed and illustrated the first Canadian comic book Billy Beaver in the early 1940s, Larry Middlestadt's art is remote from cartooning.

"I take note of contemporary art but tend to work in a style that is personal and somewhat removed," he says. He is in his own realm, creating through a process of exploration and discovery, trying, he affirms, to understand the meaning of life.

His visual sources range from landscape itself, photos of microscopic material, the way a movie camera transforms the landscape, light falling on a surface — to the contemplative as expressed in the Buddhist phrase, "To have a mind like water."

He perceives a still pond illuminated by intuition opposed by a concentric circle, an energy of existence in continual motion that both defies and invites analysis and interpretation.

In this way, he says, nature becomes his vehicle for dealing with psychic and metaphysical ideas. He sees the psychic as a way of understanding or questioning the nature of existence and the metaphysical as dealing with the nature of existence.

"I cannot deal with small issues, only universal ideas," he maintains.

The possibility of conveying philosophical and emotional content through abstract and semi-abstract images seems elusive, he concedes, but adds, "It is this possibility that animates my work!"

Spontaneity and energy in oils

Middlestadt's recent solo exhibition at the Illuminary Art Gallery, 96 Spadina Ave., featured large canvases from two series, Primordia (beginning) and Out of Darkness.

Primordia originated some nine years ago after he had been experimenting at length with water colors and was trying to recapture their spontaneity and energy in oils, using a more complex technique, a layering of images.

Much of the spontaneity has been retained. Depth and flashes of color pull the viewer in.

Fire Dance, in the Primordia series, suggests fiery figures, "little amoeba dancing," Middlestadt says.

Taoist Landscape No. 2, deep violet blues and blue greens, postulates that everything is in motion with no end and no beginning. "Even rock is in motion but infinitely more slowly than water," Middlestadt notes.

The series, Out of Darkness, emerges from Primordia.

Here, Eye of the Storm, frosty white, carmine, blue green, lashes out with a confrontational force. Under a thundering sky is the vortex — a dynamic agitation between that sky and the water.

Stillpoint, in contrast, is pure abstraction, adeptly shaded levels of transparency, blacks, whites, warm greys — the concept of a still point following chaos.

Middlestadt, an Ontario College of Art graduate, is a teacher at George Brown College. He has exhibited in many other countries including France, Holland and Switzerland. His works are also in selected corporate collections.

Spheres is kosher and cool

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Daniel Elcabas and Oren Savir, two young Orthodox men, say they and their friends had difficulty finding a place to go for shidduch dates because kosher restaurants did not have the atmosphere they wanted.

Elcabas, 31, and Savir, 29, remedied the situation by opening a kosher cafe of their own in Thornhill four months ago.

Spheres European Coffee House, located on Centre Street just west of Bathurst Street, is "known as a place for shidduch dates," say the two young entrepreneurs.

They also note that Spheres, under the Kashrut Council of Toronto (COR), is the first late night kosher cafe in Toronto. It stays open until 1 a.m. most nights and as late as 3 a.m. on Saturdays.

The co-owners combined their artistic skills — Elcabas is a mosaic tile artisan, while Savir has a background in decorative wall painting — to create a visually pleasing and low-key environment.

The colors, mosaics and halogen lighting give Spheres the look of sophistication and style that one would find in many of the upscale eateries and cafes in trendier neighborhoods.

The cafe is designed to be an intimate relaxing place, Elcabas says, pointing to the different shapes of the tables that are also spaced well apart from each other for privacy.

While they pride themselves on the cafe's food and decor, they stress that providing good service is equally important.

"We pay a lot of attention to detail. People don't expect a kosher place to have so much service. We want people to feel comfortable here."

When they came up with their concept, Savir and Elcabas say they worried at first that the cafe would be too avant garde for the Orthodox community. "But, they accepted us with open arms. They love it. They wanted something like this for a long time."

Spheres is not just a comfortable place. The food — savory and sweet — and specialty coffees like cappuccino and cafe latte, draw people from all over the city, Elcabas says.

The cafe offers Mediterranean-style cuisine, which includes such items as cream of mushroom soup, made with fresh mushrooms and real cream; salad Nicoise, made with tuna and fresh green beans; and linguini in a mushroom Alfredo sauce.

All specialty coffees and dairy dishes are made from chalav Yisrael products.

Dessert lovers might want to try one of the gourmet cakes in the display case.

The piece de resistance is Injury by Chocolate. This six-inch high chocolate layer cake is filled with chocolate mousse and covered in a dark Belgian chocolate shell, garnished with burned sugar. Most of the cakes are pareve, except for the cheese cakes.

Spheres' Belgian waffles are popular for Sunday brunch or as a dessert, says Savir as he whips up a sample of this house specialty for Elcabas. The waffles, served with ice cream and sauce or whipped cream and fresh fruit, are as much a feast for the eye as for the palate.

Young comedian's act celebrates popular culture

BY CINDY WAXER
Special to the CJN

TORONTO — Despite his made-for-television looks, stand-up comedian Michael Gelbart is more than just a pretty face in a reputedly dirty business.

Having launched his career by appearing on amateur comedy nights at age 18, Gelbart, now 27, regularly performs at Yuk Yuk's across Canada and is known to headline the comedy club's Yids In The Hall, a once-a-month evening of Jewish schtick featuring the nation's top Jewish comics.

"I like doing shows for Jewish people, because I have a lot of Jewish material that I never get a chance to do on a regular basis," he says.

However, Gelbart's teachers and classmates would be quick to testify that he had plenty of time to practise his routine in high school. "I was always the class clown as a kid and I was always really big on getting attention," he says.

But whereas his adolescent antics were punishable by detentions, these days Gelbart's distinct sense of humor is being rewarded by film and television offers.

Gelbart starred in an episode of the CBC television show Comics, played a baseball-capped computer geek in the film Panic In The Skies and served as associate producer for the film Dog's Best Friend.

He is currently awaiting word on whether or not he will appear in the upcoming film Dead End, for which he recently auditioned. It is scheduled to star Olympia Dukakis.

Gelbart is thrilled that Panic In The Skies allowed him to work with Eric Estrada of CHIPs, Kate Jackson of Charlie's Angels and Maureen McCormick, who played Marcia on The Brady Bunch.

"I hung out all day with the people I watched on TV as a kid," he says with obvious enjoyment.

In fact, his obsession with pop culture's icons permeates Gelbart's stand-up comedy. With references to such television sitcoms as Saved By The Bell, Seinfeld and Facts Of Life, his unique brand of humor pays tribute to fictional characters whose laughs are derived from everyday situations.

"My act is a celebration of media in general. It is a celebration of all popular culture," he says.

Knowledgeable about the marketability of his prime-time material, Gelbart has made a conscious effort to ensure that his comedy routine is as clean as his khaki Gap chinos.

"To me, swearing in your act is fine if there's a point, but sometimes it looks like [comedians] are swearing because they can't think of anything funny. The challenge is to come up with funny ideas and phrases that are not full of profanity."

Besides, he confesses with a trademark television reference, "People don't want to hear a guy who looks like me talking all vulgar. Women want to see me as the nice cast of Friends kind of a guy."

Michael Gelbart is scheduled to perform May 8-11 at Yuk Yuk's West, 5165 Dixie Rd., Mississauga.

No place too small for handy guide

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

No destination is too exotic for the 1997 edition of the Jewish Travel Guide (Sepher-Hermon Press,), edited by Stephen Massil.

This handy volume, which has been published for more than a century, doesn't take anything for granted.

The average reader of The Canadian Jewish News is not, I trust, interested in visiting Afghanistan, Albania, Algeria or Iran any time soon. But no matter. For your convenience and edification, these countries, as well as many others, are listed should you ever be overcome by an irresistible desire to take in their sights.

The premise of this guide is that no country is too far, too near, too bland or too dangerous for its intrepid readership.

Almost half of it is given over to Britain, Israel and the United States. Canada, in case you wondered, rates 14 pages. By contrast, Senegal is given all of two lines.

The Jewish Travel Guide concentrates on hard, everyday facts, such as the names, phone numbers and addresses of hotels, kosher restaurants, synagogues and Jewish community organizations.

It makes for rather dull reading, but if you're planning a trip to, say, Brazil, of if you ever find yourself in a jam somewhere in Asia or Africa, you'll probably be glad you have a copy of the Jewish Travel Guide in your handbag.

Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Until last year, Hummingbird Communications Ltd. was a familiar name to none but a select group within the international business/technology world.

The previously low-profile computer software company achieved instant prominence in Toronto, however, for donating $5 million to the O'Keefe Centre for the Performing Arts. The 36-year-old 3,155-seat theatre became the Hummingbird Centre for the Performing Arts in November, and will bear its new name for 20 years.

Company president and chief executive officer Fred Sorkin, 59, also kept a relatively low profile until recently. Twenty-one years after he came here from Lithuania, his story is an immigrant dream come true.

From a modest start in 1984 with less than half a dozen people, the company Sorkin co-founded with Barry Litwin (now executive vice-president, research and development) has grown to an international staff of 350. Its sleek North York head office has 260 employees, over 90 percent of whom are also immigrants.

"It's a very cosmopolitan company," said Sorkin, ever conscious of the opportunities he was given in his adopted country. Although there is no explicit policy at Hummingbird, Sorkin has made a point of hiring qualified new immigrants when possible. Even at management level there are many immigrants, he noted. "We have everybody: Chinese, Vietnamese, Indian, a lot of Russians, Czechs. Usually immigrants are very hard-working people."

Hummingbird, whose shares have been traded publicly since 1993, has four European offices (in England, France, Germany and Switzerland), three in the United States and one in Australia. The Israeli company Bynet distributes Hummingbird products in Israel and has done some contract work for the Canadian company.

Sorkin has seen company revenues leap — through sales and well-timed acquisitions — from $1.6 million to $6 million to $102 million last year. He would like to see that figure more than double again. "I hope it will not take more than 1½ to 2 years to reach $250 to $300 million."

Given Hummingbird's rapid growth, Sorkin said management has been careful not to jeopardize the company's financial standing. He wants the company to "grow, not explode." He runs a tight ship, with fewer employees than comparable companies, he said. "You [as a company] have to go all the time; as soon as you stop, someone will take your place."

Not bad for someone who immigrated 21 years ago with $150 to his name. Today Sorkin is the picture of success, cufflinks gleaming in his spotless white cuffs, a cigar stub dangling from his left hand.

While some of his eastern European counterparts were discouraged by the uphill struggle they encountered in their new home, Sorkin made a conscious effort to maintain perspective.

"Everybody has the [same] brain. There's no difference between the brain of a scientist in Russia and a scientist here," he explained in an interview at Hummingbird's head office.

Fred Sorkin

"You use the same concepts when you're building computers. The only difference is in the technology. Technology in the Soviet Union was behind by 10 to 15 years."

Sorkin's sense of humor was likely also an asset in his quest to become established here. Recalling his language difficulties when he arrived in Canada, he explained that, having studied "British English," he would turn on the television and not understand a word. "I still have good Oxford accent," he said impishly, poking fun at his heavily eastern European-flavored English.

Sorkin, who has a PhD in Computer Science from Moscow University and masters' degrees in mathematics and electronics from state universities in Vilnius, was a computer scientist and chief engineer of the Soviet Union's largest computer manufacturing firm before he emigrated.

Although such success was not unheard of in the Soviet Jewish world, neither was it typical. "In Russia, probably it wouldn't happen," Sorkin said. "Lithuania was more western oriented."

Despite his comfortable position in Lithuania, Sorkin longed for freedom — to travel, to build his own business and to speak without fear of repercussions. Having survived World War II in the Far East, where his father served as a trade attaché in Japan, Sorkin and his family returned to Lithuania, where both parents were the targets of vicious anti-Semitic persecution during Sorkin's teenage years.

By the end of the 1960s, despite the way his career was shaping up, he had made up his mind to leave.

Sorkin's sister emigrated first, leaving for Israel in 1972 at his urging. He immediately became "persona non grata, not so kosher any more."

Around the same time he made his own unsuccessful application for an exit visa. It took four tries in all before he and his wife Anya received permission to leave. Their daughter, Riva, was born in Montreal.

Meanwhile he lost his citizenship and had to resign as chief engineer to take a less prestigious job. "At least they didn't fire me. In Russia they would have fired me right away."

The applications left "a black spot" on his career. "You cannot access any longer the private documents that you could before."

In March 1976, thanks to the sponsorship of Anya's aunt, Sorkin and his wife arrived in Montreal via Vienna.

He found his first Canadian job by word of mouth through friends in the Jewish community. It wasn't until he showed up for work wearing a three-piece suit that he realized his task was to shred paper.

"But it's okay. I was quite happy to get some money. When you immigrate, you have to be prepared for everything. You have to believe in your dreams. Nobody knows your credentials. You're starting from scratch. You have to have a good attitude."

Once he was able, he began trying to help the Jewish community here and in Israel. A contributor to UJA, he has also underwritten a computer school for low-income children in Tel Aviv.

Through Hummingbird, he has also sponsored performances at the Toronto Stage Centre.

Although he had no formal business training, Sorkin had a dream — and the drive to see it through. "Dreams are one thing. Reality is another. But always, in my head, I knew I had to try my best."

In 1981 he founded Execunet, an Ottawa-based company specializing in telephone and telecommunications systems. The company was later acquired by Mitel, where Sorkin was appointed a vice-president and general manager.

In 1984 he joined Helix Investments Ltd., a venture capital firm, before founding Hummingbird later in the year.

The company name, which he happened on while browsing through an encyclopedia of birds, appealed to him for its color and the ability of its namesake to change direction in mid-flight.

Anticipating possible changes in company direction, he liked the fact that the name wasn't tied to any one product or service.

Originally a consulting company, Hummingbird soon switched its focus to software development.

Two years ago the company acquired Beame & Whiteside Software, Inc. The NFS Maestro software they subsequently developed has won several industry awards.

And was the Hummingbird Centre donation another shrewd business move? Sorkin denies the suggestion emphatically. "We didn't expect our revenues to increase [because of the donation]. We only sell four percent of our revenue in Canada." Seventy percent of Hummingbird's market is in the United States, 25 percent in Europe and the rest in the Far East and Canada, he noted.

"The donation is really to say thank you from a whole [corporate] community of more than 90 percent immigrants, to give something back. I'm really thankful to Canada that they allowed me to be a member of this society. Really, there aren't so many lucky people who can be accepted to Canada."

Lunchtime lessons prove popular

Program helps teach kids the joys of baseball

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — What started as a make-work project designed to give Michael Ullman some extra experience working with children has turned into a big business with the potential for expanding to the United States.

And unlike some of the heady, new frontier businesses that rely on high technology, Ullman's enterprise is decidedly low tech and old fashioned. Ullman is the owner/entrepreneur behind the Learn To Play Association (LTPA), a program designed to teach elementary school children the joys of baseball.

Since he launched the program in 1992, it has caught on among the youthful set faster than jester hats. From two public schools in that first year, the lunchtime program is expected to include from 220 to 300 schools across Canada and the United States when it resumes in the spring.

This winter, LTPA is continuing its growth phase as Ullman looks to schools in Winnipeg, Calgary, Edmonton, Vancouver, Ann Arbor, Mich. and Cleveland to jump on the bandwagon.

Michael Ullman gives a young slugger some pointers.

His pitch is simple. The Learn To Play Association helps children gain confidence in themselves, it aids in their socialization skills, it teaches them sportsmanship, it gives them role models and it keeps them busy during lunchtime. Ullman can point to a host of testimonials from satisfied parents and principals, who are ready to attest to the benefits offered by LTPA.

One parent points to the changed attitude in her son, who "always seemed to be left out" at lunchtime but who now "goes to school with a positive attitude...He's made new friends, not only with the children in his class but both younger and older children."

Ullman hires students enrolled in university education programs to supervise the lunchtime games, believing they serve as good role models for the kids. The program has proven so popular that Ullman no longer has the time to personally supervise each and every schoolyard.

Instead, he hires coordinators to look after regions and they, in turn, contact the schools and supervise the instructors. Ullman supplies the equipment — balls, bats, basepads and prizes.

In its first four years of operation, LTPA charged parents $25 per child, but this year the fee is climbing to $30. For that, boys and girls from Grades 1 to 6 play baseball once a week for eight weeks in May and June. They also receive certificates, buttons and participate in raffles.

With an estimated 14,000 students expected to participate in '97, gross revenues of $420,000 are expected. Ullman said his expenses continue to be high but "eventually I should be able to live on the revenue. I started the program with nothing in my pocket. I dip into the profit to build the program," obtaining equipment like radar guns and pitching machines. He expects to make running the LTPA his career with a degree in education, expected next year, as a fallback option.

A former student at Associated Hebrew Schools, Ullman, 24, devised the LTPA to satisfy the education faculty's requirement of experience working with children. He opened the program in 1992 with two participating schools, Flowervale and German Mills. The next year, 17 schools participated; in 1995, 80 schools took part. In 1996, the number had skyrocketed to 140 schools.

"When I started this, I thought there was a real need for a lunchtime program revolving around sports. At lunch, there was not a lot of supervision and there were kids not playing with other kids, being shunned by others," he said. "All I ask of the kids is for an honest effort and for them to do their best."

Peel, core, and dice the apples and sprinkle with the lemon juice. Place all ingredients in a food processor. Pulse once or twice just to break up. Let sit for the flavours to meld. Yield: About 2 cups.

About families

Dear Susan,

My husband and I are getting divorced after 35 years. While my husband and I are dealing with our separation and divorce in a completely amicable fashion, our children seem to be having difficulty accepting our situation. My daughter (age 28) wants to move back home with me. My 30-year-old son seems anxious about our future. Do you have any advice about how to help our adult children come to terms with our divorce?

Dear Reader,

I am pleased that you and your husband seem to have adjusted to the next phase of your life. Given the lack of animosity, I must assume that it was a mutual decision. Although you both seem to be adjusting effectively on either a practical or an emotional level.

There are some questions you may want to consider to help you determine why this is the case. Has the relationship between you and your husband been such that your children could have anticipated this or did their perception of your relationship cause this to be a complete surprise? Did you fully discuss the reasons for your decision regarding your separation and divorce with your children? Was the explanation given in non-judgmental terms? Did you give your children and opportunity to grieve for the family as they have known it? Did you discuss birthdays, religious holidays, weddings and other similar events and how you will participate in these events in the short, medium or long-term?

Also, what aspirations and expectations does each of your children have and what impact has your divorce had on these plans?

Your children are part of a generation bent on a personal and professional security. Your divorce may have taken them beyond their personal thresholds for risk-taking and unpredictability. Both are seeking means of "normalizing" the situation.

It is important that they do not feel they have to look after you or your husband. Conversely, if they feel a need to return home in order to be taken care of, this has to be the subject of discussion and negotiation with you and your husband. A good meal and plenty of reassurance may actually suffice. Emotional refueling is important throughout our lives, especially during time of turmoil and upheaval. I would support this kind of dependency in this case as long as it does not interfere with your plans and as long as your children lead separate and independent lives. Each child needs to negotiate a new adult relationship with each of you.

Israel and PA in standoff

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — As attention shifts to Washington for help in breathing life into the peace process, Israel and the Palestinian Authority are remaining firm in the stances that created the current logjam.

Before Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's departure for the United States, Israeli officials said he did not intend to budge from decisions to build in all areas of Jerusalem and to expand Jewish settlements in the West Bank.

Palestinian official Hanan Ashrawi also travelled to the United States, carrying a message from Palestinian Authority leader Yasser Arafat that the Palestinians were willing to resume negotiations with Israel on condition that Israel freeze all construction activity.

Palestinian officials added that they expected a U.S. invitation later for a higher-level delegation to join Ashrawi.

For his part, Netanyahu accused Arafat of giving the green light for violent demonstrations and terrorist attacks after Israel began construction of the new Jewish neighborhood of Har Choma in southeastern Jerusalem.

The premier has demanded that Arafat send out a strong message against terror and violence as a precondition for resuming negotiations with the Palestinian Authority.

Top court to hear appeal

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Supreme Court of Canada has agreed to hear an appeal in a case involving three alleged Nazi war criminals, but it has set a limited time span in which to do so.

As a condition for hearing the appeal, the High Court stated the cases must be presented during its spring sitting, which concludes on June 27.

Lawyers for Helmut Oberlander, Johann Dueck and Erichs Tobiass are expected to argue that interference in the judicial process has tainted the cases and requires a stay of proceedings to correct it.

Nazi snitch line considered

'A choice between bad and worse'

By RABBI REUVEN P. BULKA
Special to The CJN

A few weeks ago, I had the opportunity to hear Steve Rambam speak about how he had elicited "confessions" in the form of boastful accounts of mass murder and brutality from the mouths of proud Nazi murderers and accomplices living in Canada.

It hurt to hear Canada being condemned when this issue exploded in the American media a few weeks ago. It hurt even more because we love Canada, and know that the overwhelming majority of Canadians would be outraged if they knew the full story of how the door to Jews was closed, but the door was flung open wide to the Nazis after the war. This policy did not represent Canada or Canadianism; it represented the antithesis.

I listened carefully as Rambam moved from past to future, from lament to formulating strategy. I could hardly believe my ears when I heard him suggest that we try to turn Nazi against Nazi, by offering immunity from prosecution for those who would "sing" against other Nazis, and through that singing the government succeeds in deporting them.

Comment

I cringed at the thought that we should be in cahoots with the devil, that we should offer sanctuary and asylum, in such an official way, to perpetrators of such horrible crimes. It was of little comfort to hear that t[illegible]

United States, and of even less comfort to hear that this is standard procedure in the pursuit of criminals.

I am still very uncomfortable with this approach. These were the people who murdered my grandparents, and the loved ones of so many Jews the world over. But I am even more uncomfortable at the thought that so many Nazis here in Canada will live out their lives without suffering any consequence for their evil.

We are confronted not with a choice between a good alternative and a bad alternative. We are confronted with a choice between a bad alternative and a worse alternative.

There are those who in principle want nothing to do with Nazis, and do not want any involvement with offering them a safe haven.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Hecht Appointment

MONTREAL — Deputy premier and minister of state for the economy and finance, Bernard Landry, announced the appointment of Thomas O. Hecht to the board of directors of the Caisse de dépôt et de placement du Québec, the body that oversees the province's pension plan.

Hecht holds honorary doctorates from both Ben-Gurion University and Bar-Ilan-University. He is also founder of the Begin-Sadat Centre for Strategic Studies, and is chair of its international board.

He serves on the president's advisory council of the Montreal Jewish General Hospital.

Bonds Appointment

TORONTO — Lawrence Waller has been named executive vice-president of Canada-Israel Securities Ltd. Currently the director for Ontario, Waller has been with Israel Bonds for 11 years.

ISRAEL

Bus Attacked

JERUSALEM — Israeli-Palestinian tensions rose another notch last week after a gasoline bomb was hurled at an Israeli bus in the West Bank. The bus was transporting Israeli soldiers to serve as guards at Jewish settlements.

The April 2 attack, which occurred near Ramallah, caused the bus to catch fire. The driver lost control of the vehicle, which tumbled over an embankment.

Eleven troops were wounded, most of them lightly. They were treated for fractures and bruises at Jerusalem hospitals.

Arafat's Account

JERUSALEM — Israel has deposited some $160,000 in a secret Tel Aviv bank account belonging to Palestinian Authority leader Yasser Arafat since 1994, an Israeli newspaper reported last week.

An inquiry by senior officials from European Union donor countries found that only Arafat and his economic adviser were authorized to draw funds from the account, located in a Tel Aviv branch of Bank Leumi, according to the Israeli daily Ha'aretz.

WORLD

Rome Shul Attacked

ROME — A crude firebomb was hurled at Rome's main synagogue, causing minor damage to the entrance.

The synagogue was empty at the time of the Saturday night attack, and no injuries were reported.

Italian police detained a suspect, a 34-year-old Egyptian who apparently seemed drunk or mentally disturbed.

Anti-Semitic Flyers

MOSCOW — About 200,000 residents of the southern Russian region of Volgograd recently found anti-Semitic leaflets in their mailboxes.

The flier, which contained various anti-Semitic slogans, also made references to members of the Russian Cabinet and other top Russian officials who are Jewish.

The leaflet claimed that Russia is an occupied country with no ethnic Russians in the federal government.

Braille Hagaddah

NEW YORK — Individuals who have difficulty reading regular print may obtain a large print or braille Haggadah, free of charge, by forwarding their request, by mail or fax with a note from their eye care specialist indicating their condition to The Jewish Heritage for the Blind, PO Box 336, Brooklyn, NY, 11229-2401 or fax 718-338-0653.

Holocaust at Nuremberg

TUCSON, Ariz. — Michael Marrus of the University of Toronto will be presenting a paper on the Holocaust at Nuremberg, and Paulina Laymam of Concordia University will present a paper on the manifestation of Shechinah in Jewish women's ritual, at the third annual meeting of the Western Jewish Studies Association to be held on the University of Arizona campus, April 6 to 8.

The theme of the conference is Women in Jewish Life and Culture. It is the fist international, interdisciplinary scholarly conference held on this subject.

Rosenblum Mourned

NEW YORK — A graveside service was recently held for Samuel Rosenblum, 77, a noted Yiddish poet and writer and longtime executive vice-president of the Cantors Assembly.

Since 1959, Chazzan Rosenblum had served as the professional head of the 450-member Cantors Assembly — the world's largest body of chazzanim — after completing a three-year term as its president. He was one of 10 cantors who founded the group in 1947.

SOVIET JEWS DRAGGED FROM MOSCOW SERVICE

A Russian speaking Jew from Moscow said Soviet militia invaded the Great Synagogue and dragged worshippers outside, beating and kicking them.

Dr. Roman Rutman, a cybernetic ist recently fired, said, "Twenty-five young Jews were dragged from the synagogue, and outside on the street, crowds of anti-Semites hurled epithets such as 'Jew pig' at them."

DOCTOR QUESTIONS CAUSE OF TAY-SACHS DISEASE

With a PhD from McGill University, a $40,000 Ontario government grant and a moral obligation guiding his conscience, Dr. Alex Lowden, 39, is well on his way toward tracking down a cruel genetic abnormality which transforms spirited Jewish children into virtual vegetables before killing them.

"It's impossible to say when we'll have the answer," Lowden said. He believes that maybe Tay-Sachs children are not afflicted with an enzyme absence as most medical experts insist.

"If you can show the enzyme [which breaks down fatty substances in cells] is there, but has no activity, you can look for things that would make the enzyme function."

Alleged war criminals respond to 'snitch' line

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Two alleged Nazi war criminals have already been "flipped" into giving evidence against former colleagues, U.S. Nazi hunter Steven Rambam said last week in Montreal.

"We have already found two war criminals ready to testify," Rambam revealed at a recent breakfast at the Shomrim Laboker Synagogue.

"They are cooperating. Despite the claims that we're siding with murderers, this program is effective and working."

The New York private eye — who made international headlines after duping dozens of suspected Nazis living in Canada into admitting their participation in atrocities against Jews — was referring to the controversial new hotline set up at Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) that allows informants, including suspected Nazi war criminals, to "rat" on their former colleagues.

In exchange for cooperating, CJC indicated it would turn over any information to the Justice Department and ask that informants not be targetted for deportation.

B'nai Brith (BB) has attacked the policy as "morally reprehensible" for a Jewish organization and as "an insult to the memory of those who died in the Holocaust," in the words of BB war crimes task force chair Thomas Hecht.

But Rambam, joined by CJC national community relations director Bernie Farber, defended the policy, saying among the few remaining witnesses to war crimes are war criminals themselves.

Farber said CJC was left with no other choice and criticized BB's going outside the Jewish community to oppose the policy.

He said unlike the Office of Special Investigations (OSI) Nazi-hunting unit in the United States, which is manned by Jews and by "special teams of historians and special investigators" that can make deals in exchange for catching the "bigger fish," Canadian authorities have not operated the same way and refused to consider accepting testimony from such witnesses.

"Our unit is neither here nor there," Farber said. "It is mostly made up of cops who don't have the historical acumen to put complicated cases together."

Asked what the motive would be for a suspected Nazi war criminal to come forward and cooperate if the chance of eventually being deported was negligible anyway, Rambam replied:

"Because for the first time, they do have something to fear.

"[We tell them:] 'If you don't cooperate, we will build a case against you.'

"And it's worked not once, but twice. It is not abstract theory."

"Whoever cooperates gets a break. That's what the RCMP should have been doing for the last 40 years."

Speaking to the breakfast audience of 300, Rambam was typically brash and blunt. He expressed little or no faith in Canadian authorities' commitment to bringing suspected war criminals to justice and criticized what he considered historical apathy on the part of Canadian Jewry in pursuing the issue.

"I really don't care what the RCMP or government is doing. I only care about what the Jewish community is doing," he said.

"Now it is an issue of Jewish honor and ahavat Yisrael and what is a Jewish life worth.

"If you can leave here a little aggravated, maybe you'll be motivated to do something."

Both Farber and Rambam called on members of the local Jewish community to show up by the hundreds at a planned rally on May 4, Holocaust Remembrance Day, to protest the slow pace of deportation proceedings against suspected Nazi war criminals.

Participants at the breakfast also signed a petition to that effect and Rambam said he would cooperate with the initiative of one Montreal Holocaust survivor — Issie Veisfeld — to bring the issue before the United Nations.

Rambam also announced that he has started to identify suspected collaborators publicly and said he would continue to do so on a weekly basis. Rambam named one suspect living in Burlington, Ont., who landed safely in Canada a decade ago after fleeing war criminal charges in the United States (his name was revealed in a recent report on "Canada's dark secret" on CBS' 60 Minutes).

CJC has also called for his prosecution.

Farber said CJC is also looking at the potential of identifying suspected Nazi war criminals if Justice Minister Allan Rock does not follow through on his promise to name 12 more who would face deportation hearings.

Earlier, Farber criticized Rock for refusing to give a public accounting of Canada's Nazi-hunting activities in terms of budgeting details and caseload numbers.

Time to react to crisis gripping campuses

Last week in this space, I wrote about the critical importance of making Jewish support services available to our children attending college or university. Only by ensuring that there are adequate support services, I wrote, "can we give them and us too, the best chance that they will cherish and adopt into their own lives, the values, customs, and traditions of Judaism."

But in the greater Toronto area, those services are terribly inadequate. And we run a great risk of "losing" our children to the frenzied, heavily peer-pressured market of competing ideas and values because of it.

To emphasize the point, I analogized "unlike the expenses we do not spare to insure our precious stones, we spare almost every expense to insure the Jewish wellbeing of our children on campus."

It was no exaggeration.

There are an estimated 15,000 Jewish students attending York University, the University of Toronto, Ryerson and Seneca colleges, and the many community colleges in the Greater Toronto area.

At present, a heroic, over-worked and under-resourced staff of six people at the Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto (JCS) attempts to serve the myriad pressing needs in providing programming, facilitating, counselling and just plain personal help for these 15,000 of our children.

JCS came into being in May 1995 when, responding to a gaping need in the vacuum of Jewish campus services here, the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto recruited Zac Kaye, a creative, dedicated, experienced, compassionate and highly-principled professional from Vancouver to design, build and head the organization which subsequently became known as the JCS.

Along with Helen Finder-Guttman, Kaye set to work on creating the new student services organization. It is unlikely they had any idea at the time of the true dimension of the challenge that lay in store.

With a new mission and purpose guiding them, an operational plan put in place and staff hired, the first board and officers of the JCS were elected in November 1996. Dr. Arthur Kruger, agreed to serve as its volunteer president.

Without listing the many achievements on his curriculum vitae, suffice to say that Kruger has spent his entire adult life engaged in civilization's most important activity, the under-appreciated endeavor we call "education." Kruger is an expert in "education," in its broad sense, in the fullest meaning of the word. When he speaks, people listen. When he speaks about education and the needs of students, people take notes.

He recently wrote about the nature and extent of Jewish campus services available to students in the Greater Toronto area. He pulled no punches.The following are excerpts.

"(O)ur operating budget puts Toronto at the very bottom of the list of North American cities in expenditures per students. (Kruger's emphasis.) for a community that prides itself on its achievements and that claims to be serious about 'continuity,' this is a disgrace. Montreal spends twice as much as Toronto on campus and has about half the student population of Toronto.

"To indicate the magnitude of our problems, let us compare Toronto with Vancouver. There the community has provided funds for four full-time professionals to serve 1,200 students. York and the University of Toronto, each with about 5,000 students are served by one professional on each campus. Ryerson, with a student population the size of Vancouver's, is served 50 percent of the time by one professional. There are no resources at all devoted to the numerous campuses with smaller, but significant Jewish student bodies.

"Students at York have a modest area of their own for informal and formal events. It doesn't begin to compare with facilities available at comparable or even much smaller student bodies elsewhere.

"Students at the University of Toronto look with envy at what York students have. They are currently in a small, rat-infested basement and will be evicted from there at the end of June."

(The federation has found a new site for the students within Whitney Hall. But thus far, they have not found the funding. Unless a donor or donors come forward with funds very soon, the Jewish students at U of T will have nowhere to "call home" on that campus.)

"At Ryerson, our half-time worker operates from a closet with room for one chair and a small table, even that shared with the Macedonian students on campus."

It should be noted that Ryerson is the fifth largest university in terms of Jewish population in Canada, and there is funding for only a half-time worker who must be shared with Seneca colleges.

The six staff people at the JCS are able to reach just over 2,100 of the 15,000 Jewish students on campus. Recent innovative arrangements initiated by the JCS with different arms of Reform, Conservative and Orthodox agencies will extend the JCS reach on the campuses to some extent. But its reach, nevertheless, will still fall far short of all the students who want, let alone need, some form of Jewish contact on campus.

So much has already been achieved by the JCS in the two years it has been in operation. But there is so much still that needs to be done. Will it have sufficient opportunity and resources to do so?

Thus, I ask again what was asked last week. "At this critically important stage in their lives, do our children have the benefit on campus of positive Jewish influences, of inspiring Jewish role models, of meeting places where they can come together with their peers to discuss, argue debate, or sing or dance?

"We cannot assume and we must do more than merely hope that our children will automatically grasp tightly to the ways of their forebears. We must take steps."

It is no exaggeration. There is indeed a crisis. And we must react.

In the next column, I will discuss how. MBD

God can't stop all tragedies, says Rabbi Kushner

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The way to deal with tragedy is "to take the white heat of your pain and send it out to make the world a better place," asserts Rabbi Harold Kushner.

"You had no choice about the tragedy [that befell you], but you do have a choice of how to live the rest of your life," he told a crowd of over 500 people who jammed the Leah Posluns Theatre last week.

Rabbi Kushner, author of the bestseller When Bad Things Happen to Good People, gave the Marsha Goldstein Quiles Yahrtzeit Lecture for Kolel: a Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning. The event was co-sponsored by the Bathurst Jewish Centre and Bereaved Jewish Families.

When he and his family had to deal with the long illness and eventual death of his son, he found that "when I tried to say the same things to myself that I said to congregants [when they were going through tragedies], I realized how uncomforted I was."

People told him all the traditional things, he said: It is God's will; you must stay strong enough to be an example ("I wanted to ask someone else to be an example"); God doesn't give us more than we are able to deal with.

"I finally realized that these words weren't meant to comfort me — they were designed to defend God. And God would probably say that He can take care of Himself."

In his grief, Rabbi Kushner said, he went to the Book of Job, the classic tale of a good man who was made to suffer unbearable sorrows.

There were three premises in Job, he said, of which one could only believe two: God is all powerful; God is completely good; and Job is a good person.

Rabbi Harold Kushner

"Job's three friends felt it was so important to affirm the teachings of their childhood that they had to deny the third — a classic case of blaming the victim."

This is the same argument used against rape and Holocaust victims, he said — that a woman shouldn't have gone out alone at night or dressed the way she was, and that German Jews shouldn't have been so successful financially.

Job, he said, couldn't accept that, saying that while he may not have been perfect, he wasn't worse than anyone else.

This premise, he said, also denies that God is good or that He acts fairly.

"That's terrible," Rabbi Kushner said. "If God isn't committed to justice and compassion, where do we get those attitudes?"

He slammed those who claimed he just couldn't understand God's ways. "That's not an issue. We do understand — we understand when a drunk driver kills someone or when a toddler drowns. And it's not fair."

The only conclusion he could come to is that God is not all-powerful. And that is perfectly acceptable to him. "If I am compelled to choose between a God who is righteous but not all-powerful, or one who is powerful and not righteous, I will take the first one."

Why then do these things happen?

Rabbi Kushner's explanations, he admitted, are "unconventional."

First, he said, God withheld from nature a gift He gave to human beings: the ability to tell the difference between good and bad. "A falling rock and a flawed airplane don't care what kind of person you are — they are obeying the laws of physics."

Much the same issue arises about tragedies caused by other people. He slammed those who ask why God allowed the Holocaust to happen. "The question isn't how God could allow it, but how people could be so evil.

"To even hint that God had a part in it, hints at a God so evil, why would we worship Him?"

God is present when we suffer, Rabbi Kushner said. "That's where He was at Auschwitz," the rabbi said, quoting German thinker Dorothy Sola. "God was at the side of the victims, grieving and suffering with them."

Then too, he said, the explanation can be a matter of priorities.

"When we are ready to spend as much on cancer research as on cigarettes or give more to research than we do to football quarterbacks, then diseases will be conquered."

When a friend or relative is suffering, the rabbi advised, reach out. "Why me is not a question, it is a cry of pain. Respond by easing that pain, by being ready to listen, holding hands or hugging."

Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, director and rosh yeshivah of Kolel, said that she and her family decided to organize this yearly lecture to "celebrate the life and honor the memory" of her sister, Marsha Goldstein Quiles, who died five years ago at the age of 40.

Tapes from the lecture are available from Kolel. Telephone 905-764-1329.

Despite apparent prosperity, Eilat's welfare rolls high

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Eilat, Israel's Red Sea resort, is a study in paradox.

Prosperous by all appearances, with virtually no unemployment, Eilat is nonetheless struggling with an onerous welfare roll.

It's admittedly an odd situation, Eilat's mayor, Gabi Kadosh, acknowledged in an interview last week.

Driven by a hotel building boom valued at $850 million (US), Eilat's population has grown from 35,000 to 50,000 in the past three years.

The majority of the newcomers are from economically depressed areas in the Negev, and the jobs they usually land in Eilat's booming tourist industry pay minimum wages.

As a result, Kadosh explained, they find it necessary to supplement their meagre salaries with welfare payments.

"We have 2,100 welfare cases," he said. "It's well above the national average."

Kadosh, who has been mayor since 1993, hopes that an innovative Jewish Agency program, Partnership 2000, will alleviate some of Eilat's social problems.

Launched in 1995 in cooperation with the United Jewish Appeal and Keren Hayesod, Partnership 2000 pairs 28 regions in Israel with scores of Jewish communities in North America, including Toronto.

Its broad goals are to develop the Negev and the Galilee, encourage personal investment in Israel and create people-to-people contacts between Israel and the Diaspora.

Toronto is paired with Eilat and the neighboring Eilot region, with its 10 kibbutzim and one community village.

The Partnership 2000 program for Toronto and Eilat consists of about a dozen projects, primarily in the fields of welfare, supplementary education and economic development.

Partnership 2000 evolved from Toronto's relationship with Eilat in Project Renewal, explained Kadosh. Due to be phased out in three years, Project Renewal is basically concerned with urban renewal.

Kadosh said that Eilat's ills stem in part from the fact that it has a lot of single-parent households and has absorbed 6,000 new immigrants, mainly from the former Soviet Union and Ethiopia, in the last few years.

Partnership 2000, he noted, is expected to help such people.

Turning to Eilat's vital tourism sector, which generated $350 million in revenue last year, Kadosh said that each new hotel room creates at least one new job. And judging from projections, many more jobs will come on line over the next several years.

Eilat has 32 hotels and 8,000 rooms today. Within three years, there will be 12,000 rooms. By the year 2010, Eilat will reach its saturation point of 46 to 48 hotels and 17,000 rooms, he said.

In 1996, Eilat attracted 320,000 tourists, equally divided between foreigners and Israelis, and the figure is steadily rising. In his estimation, 500,000 tourists will visit Eilat within the year 2000.

Eilat has not been affected by the spate of terrorism which has convulsed Israel since 1996. Kadosh said. "We market Eilat separately from Israel."

However, due to the still simmering controversy over dormant Jewish bank accounts in Switzerland, Swiss companies have cancelled direct charter flights to Eilat, with a net loss of 800 visitors per week.

"This has caused great damage," lamented Kadosh.

Political tensions between Israel and Jordan have not affected commerce, he said. A plan for a joint airport in Eilat and the adjacent Jordanian port of Aqaba is in the works. Barring technical glitches, the facility may be ready as early as next winter, Kadosh disclosed.

The proposed airport would incorporate current and yet-to-be-built features of both airports: Aqaba's present runway and Eilat's new terminal.

Kadosh said he is currently working with Jordanian, Palestinian and Egyptian officials on a special tour package. It would encompass Eilat, Petra, Jericho and Egypt.

Although tourism is the bedrock of Eilat's economy, Kadosh is trying to diversify it by building a hi-tech industrial park.

As well, Kadosh wants the Israeli government to extend a rail line to Eilat which now ends in Oron, a phosphate production centre in the heart of the Negev. "We're missing only 175 kilometres of track," he said.

National Infrastructure Minister Ariel Sharon appears interested in the extension and has allocated funds for a study.

Arab paper claims Jews planning 'Holocaust'

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — An Arab-language newspaper based in Montreal has published an article claiming Jewish organizations are planning a Holocaust against Arabs living in North America.

The article, which appeared in the March 5 issue of Al-Miraat (The Mirror), repeats a number of allegations historically associated with neo-Nazi propaganda, including that they have control of the media and control over the highest U.S. political leadership, and wrongfully seek compensation for the Holocaust. The article describes Jewish organizations as greedy and spiteful and claims they are conspiring for a "Jewish jihad to legislate hate in America."

The article, written by Farid Habshi, ostensibly begins with a critique of a proposal by U.S. Vice-President Al Gore for legislation to allow airport security personnel "to isolate passengers who fit the description of [or look like] terrorists."

Criticism of that proposal quickly led to a wide-ranging attack on Jews, who, the article claims, are behind the proposal and who allegedly, with a loyal media in tow, have linked Arabs with terrorism.

The article accuses Zionist organizations of waging "jihad to legislate spite against the Arabs in America."

In a rambling and often incoherent rush of allegations, the article downplays the Nazi propaganda assault against Jews and goes on to ask: "If he [Nazi propaganda minister Josef Goebbels] could with Hitler achieve all that, why have the Jewish organizations failed through the years to turn the Arabs living in Canada and America to burning ashes? ...

"And knowing that the Jewish organizations in Canada and America [control] thousands of radios and television stations and it has thousands of newspapers, magazines and book printers and it has films, video, disk and Internet and other propaganda facilities that work 24 hours a day under the supervision of the best professionals and flood the world with spite poisons against the Arabs?"

The article then states that "Jewish thinkers" ran out of excuses to blame the world for their tragedies; so they turned to "hate merchants to find a solution for this problem."

The "hate merchants" in turn, "chose 'the autocratic solution' of tampering with the U.S. administration and legislative system to introduce tyrannic laws similar to Nazi and fascist laws. They involved the vice-president and the president in their conspiracies and...the aim is to prove to the world that it is in their ability to take up Gore and [Bill] Clinton by hand in order to behave like Goebbels and Hitler, and explode in America a Holocaust against the Arabs like the Holocaust which the Jews had suffered in Europe.

"We are expecting this experience in the chain of experiences which the Jewish organizations are doing in the frame of social engineering to design the world, but the opinion here is that the experience will end like the previous ones when the innocent Jews will be the ones that will be burned and not the Arabs in the flames of spite and greed, which are in their organizations."

The article was translated from Arabic by Sasson Mayer, an Iraqi-born Jew who reads several Arab newspapers each week.

In January, Mayer provided The CJN with translations from other articles carried in the Al-Miraat and Al-Orouba newspapers. An Oct. 9, 1996 article in Al-Miraat focused on the opening of the controversial Jerusalem tunnel. Among the statements contained in the article is that "history has taught us that you cannot trust their side."

A poem that ran in the paper's May 15, 1996 edition compared Israelis to Nazis. (CJN Jan. 16).

Meanwhile, an article in Al-Orouba was even more inflammatory. It said the Holocaust was a lie, it called Jews spiteful, it argued that Jews control the media and that Jews exert a "wicked and poisonous" influence over the world.

After meeting with a delegation from Canadian Jewish Congress, the editor of Al-Orouba agreed to run an apology; however, the newspaper has not been published since that meeting.

David Sultan, director of community relations for Congress' Quebec region, called the Al-Miraat article "hate literature" and "just straight, plain anti-Semitism."

He said he would seek a meeting with the paper's editor, Saadi Al-Malih, in which he will call for a public apology to be run in the same place in the paper in which the offending article was carried.

"I'm ready to go to the press council if the meeting is unsuccessful," he added.

Al-Malih declined to comment.

Hilton halachah

"It is prohibited to pray in a non-Orthodox temple at any time...Therefore, we call upon all Jews to discontinue to pray any time in a Conservative or Reform temple."

Thus began the halachic ruling stating "Reform and Conservative are not Judaism at all, but another religion" proclaimed by the Agudath Harabonim 10 days ago at a press conference in the swanky Clinton Suite, second floor of the New York Hilton Hotel, a rather unusually secular setting for so unusually religious a ruling.

But then, there was much that was unusual about the declaration. For example, in an effort to lend it both halachic and moral authority, the Agudath Harabonim invoked the names of four of the greatest sages of this century: Rabbi Moshe Feinstein, Rabbi Joseph B. Soloveitchik, Chief Rabbi Isaac Herzog of Israel and the Lubavitcher Rebbe. But never, while they were alive, (our emphasis) did Agudath Harabonim ever publish such a declaration.

Nor can we recall any instance in living memory of Torah sages hiring a public relations firm to issue a press release to the non-Jewish media announcing the impending ruling of a "historic halachic declaration."

Nor indeed, is a press conference at the Hilton, or at any hotel, the usual method of issuing a halachic ruling, historic or otherwise.

Timed to coincide with the vote in the Knesset over the controversial conversion bill, the Hilton halachic ruling was more about politics than about religion, and thus in most eyes, bereft of any religious or moral authority the Agudath Harabonim so craved.

Without denying their differences of opinion with Conservative and Reform Jews, "on core theological issues," the Rabbinical Council of America (RCA) and the Union of Orthodox Jewish Congregations of America (OU) quickly and unequivocally repudiated the declaration. "It does not reflect the sentiments of mainstream Orthodox Jewish thought since it implies the disenfranchisement of Jews as Jews. This hurtful public pronouncement flies in the face of Jewish peoplehood," they said in a joint press release.

Agudath Israel of America, more "right wing" in outlook than the RCA and the OU, also repudiated the Hilton ruling. "It is crucial that the public realize that Orthodox Jews' principled refusal to accept the idea of "multiple Judaisms" is in no way whatsoever a rejection of any of our beloved fellow Jews."

Even so, with the majority of the entire Jewish world critical of the "historic halachic declaration," it nevertheless caused considerable pain and distress, stabbing at the sensibilities of deeply devoted and deeply committed Jews, and attempting to cut an excisory swath through the inter-communal, interdependent and interrelated fabric of the Jewish people.

At a time when the justice of the Jewish claim to all of Jerusalem is being challenged in both the eastern Muslim world and in the western Christian world, when Jewish lives around the globe are threatened by radical Islamic fundamentalist terrorists, when an increasing number of Jews are turning away from any form of Judaism and when the memory of an assassinated Jewish leader still aches, one wonders about the integrity of the ruling.

We conclude with the wise words of the RCA and of the OU, "To recklessly emphasize the issues that divide and thus seemingly delegitimize large numbers of Jews, harms the efforts of all who seek resolution to the difficult issues facing world Jewry."

The only "ecumenical" cause The CJN will ever support is one which promotes the unity of the Jewish people. The ill-advised, "historic" Hilton ruling promotes division. It therefore deserves to be ignored.

THE FIRST ZIONIST CONFERENCE, BASEL 1897

"Nowhere is the coming of the Jews so promptly noted as in the historic home...for the very reason that it is the historic home...The immigration of Jews signifies an...accession of strength for the land which is now so poor..."

Was our reporter (tomato) sauced?

Your news report by Frances Kraft (CJN, March 20) entitled "Israeli Tomatoes Help Fight Assimilation," unfortunately contains many errors which should be publicly corrected.

You have wrongly identified the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care as carrying out the research in question; the correct name is the Baykrecht Centre. The 95-year-old patient who sang Havah Nagilah following a meal of spaghetti and tomato sauce (her true age was 98) did in fact did give the clue that led researchers to isolating the active substance, but the ingredient was contained in the flour from which the spaghetti was prepared, not in the tomatoes.

Investigation revealed that the kibbutz that grew the wheat from which the flour was made was downwind from the Dimona Atomic Station. Radioactive material, accidentally released from the station, contaminated the grain, causing the remarkable effects that were reported. Kraft is not aware that the chimpanzees in question have progressed from the Hebrew sign language to the level required to operate appliances and fixtures on the Sabbath, a practice approved in a ruling by Rabbi Ovadia Yosef which was recently reported in your journal.

Although not confirmed, other reports indicate that cows grazing on contaminated fields were seen dancing a horah, and that cucumbers grown in the kibbutz garden, when pickled, led to a greatly increased thirst for Jewish lore, as evidenced by an unprecedented demand for the single copy of the Talmud in the kibbutz library.

It would be well for Kraft to be more sure of her facts before setting them forth in print.

Secular Jews do their part

In a recent issue of The CJN, when a group of students were discussing intermarriage and various other aspects of growing up Jewish, a young Orthodox Jew said he felt that the existence of Orthodoxy (or the existence of Orthodox Jews) enabled secular Jews to exist.

Oh, the arrogance of youth! A young Orthodox Jew feels that the existence of his Orthodoxy is what enables secular Jews to exist. On my 22nd trip to Israel, I flew with a plane full of Orthodox Jews who were coming from New York to influence the election. I felt, watching them, that my secular daughter and her secular husband, he a sabra, she an Israeli of 25 years, bringing up two sons, are perhaps providing the strength that enables Orthodox Jews to live safely in New York, while secular Jews are fighting their battles in Israel.

CJN editor respected small communities

As a member of the Montreal Jewish community I took my Judaism for granted. When you live in such a large and vibrant community, you assume that the feeling of inclusion is common to all Jewish communities, even those in small and remote places that we only read about in The CJN. After moving to Victoria in 1990, I discovered that my Jewish experience was in for a small-community shock. The level of apathy and assimilation was worse than I experienced in Montreal and I was falling into that trap.

Then I met Maurice Lucow, an unassuming man, sitting quietly in the front row of every event in our community, his steno pad always ready to note any comment later to be used for a story that put Victoria and British Columbia at the centre of Jewish issues in Canada.

Today Maurice is gone. I miss his quiet presence and his biting wit. I worry that without him, the unique feeling of inclusion I developed in my small community will waver and die. Through his work, I know that we are all an important part of the worldwide Jewish community, no matter where or how few of us live in any one community.

That is Maurice Lucow's legacy to me and to all of us who live in small communities everywhere.

Don't shelter war criminals in Canada

I watched with horror the CBC documentary broadcast on The National on Jan. 30. The heel-dragging on the part of the Canadian government in taking up the issue of Nazi war criminals in Canada denigrates the unimaginable suffering and memory of those whose lives were destroyed and altered forever as a result of their experience of dehumanization and oppression during the war.

As a Canadian of Polish descent, I am not unfamiliar with the horrors of the Holocaust. The circle of my family's acquaintances included many men and women who bore the tattoos of their oppression on their forearms. Their lives, like that of the Jewish survivor in the documentary, have been transformed forever. The suggestion that the atrocities be forgotten and forgiven represents a type of rationality which is the first step towards the revision of historical facts to promulgate the view that the Holocaust and genocide of non-Jews did not occur. This is deeply disturbing.

This past summer I visited Auschwitz; the experience left me shaken in ways which words cannot express. I as a Canadian, publicly voice my support for the ongoing efforts of the Canadian Jewish Congress to bring to light the issue of Nazi war criminals in Canada. The complicity of the Canadian government is shameful indeed.

Perspectives

A Montrealer's cri de coeur

By STANLEY K. PLOTNICK
Special to The CJN

There is probably no people that has a deeper understanding of, or commitment to, the concept of collective responsibility than we, the Jewish people. The sense that each of us is responsible for the other is "bred in our bones," to paraphrase Robertson Davies. Indeed, as history has proven, our very survival too frequently has been dependent upon unquestioned commitment to each other.

Stanley K. Plotnick

There is no shortage of recent manifestations of this unquestioned commitment to each other: The Six Day War, Operation Exodus, Operation Solomon, and the rescue and resettlement of the Jews in the former Soviet Union. These examples, of course, dealt with "overseas" situations, when our commitment to each other was mobilized for the sake of our brethren in far-off homes who faced physical peril.

But there is a situation much closer to home, without the aspect of physical peril, but still with its own urgency, that calls upon us as a people to invoke that same unquestioned commitment to each other.

I am referring to the "situation" facing the Jews of Montreal. This is a cri de coeur, a call from the heart, to our fellow Jews across Canada.

We, the 101,000 Jews of Montreal, love living here, want to stay here and hope to continue to prosper, as we have in the past. Virtually every member of the community wants to be part of Canada. But we face difficult challenges every day, because many Quebecers want Quebec to leave Canada, and many other Canadians are indifferent.

We want to stay here — as most people want to stay in the place of their birth, the place they know best — whether it is for the unique quality of life in Montreal, the strength, closeness and splendid multicultural dimension of our community, the lifetime of family and friends, the comfort of home, or simply because it feels right.

We are saddened therefore, and occasionally frustrated, that others across Canada seem unable to understand the unique stress and anxiety that we face in our day-to-day lives, as individuals and as a community.

It is, possibly, difficult to understand our situation because it is even difficult to explain it. But we must nevertheless try.

How can one fully convey the anger, discomfort and for some, even the fear we endured on referendum night as the results slowly moved from bare Yes to bare No? How can one fully convey the sinking feeling of listening to those infamous words of Jacques Parizeau, blaming the referendum loss on "money and the ethnic vote"? How can we explain our frustration, after playing such a vital role in the development of Quebec, to no longer be unquestionably regarded as at least equals amongst all its citizens?

And if we cannot fully convey what we felt, how can the Jews in the rest of Canada fully understand?

Can anyone outside Montreal understand that we are even reluctant to read the local news in the Gazette or watch the local news on TV, knowing that we are constantly confronting new challenges to our rights and roles, or new restrictions on the use of the English language?

Imagine the feeling of watching our Montreal, once the country's most outstanding city, a beautiful tapestry of cultures and languages, and an economic hub, slowly diminishing.

Imagine the feeling of seeing our children move away to avoid this extraordinary stress and to find a place of perceived greater economic potential for themselves and for their own growing families.

Imagine knowing that when they leave, their hearts are as sad as ours, because once, they too had planned to live their lives in Montreal.

The Jewish community of Montreal was once the pre-eminent Jewish community in Canada, stable, multigenerational, caring, vigorous and creative. Today, our Shabbat tables are a lot emptier. Those of us who can, spend many weekends in Toronto or Vancouver or Miami or Chicago or Boston or Seattle, where many of our children now live.

But many of us cannot be at our children's tables on Shabbat.

Not surprisingly, the economic infrastructure of the community is threatened as people leave, or even think of leaving.

The leadership of the community in Montreal must deal with the situation: existential, emotional, psychological and economic. And the Montreal leadership is dealing with these issues — it is committed to underscoring the unique values of Jewish life in Montreal; finding jobs for young graduates who want to stay; and working with the government to protect Jewish institutions.

And yet despite everything, despite the stress and the anxiety, we remain deeply dedicated to our distinctive lives as part of an exemplary Jewish community in this incredibly beautiful, exciting city in Quebec, in Canada.

It is out of this deeply rooted sense of belonging to Quebec and to Canada that we direct our eyes to our fellow Jews throughout the country, hoping that they will respond to the invocation of that same unquestioned commitment to each other.

It is incomprehensible to most of us that so many Canadians, especially Jewish Canadians, do not see the impact that separation would have upon each of them individually and, in fact, on all of Canada.

It is even more disappointing, however, that so many Canadians, especially Jewish Canadians, seem willing to ignore the impact that separation would have upon us, their fellow Jews — virtually all deeply committed Canadians like themselves — whom they would be abandoning in an independent Quebec.

Is it not part of our attachment as Jews, one to the other, that Jews across the country would be deeply and openly concerned about our hopes, our dreams and our futures, compassionate for the anxieties we face?

If only for these reasons, would not Jews across the country be supportive of every effort to keep Quebec and us, the Montreal Jewish community, within Canada?

We find it sad and painful that Jews across the country find it difficult to distinguish between the needs of the Montreal Jewish community and the frustrations we all share with the separatist policies of the government of Quebec.

Perhaps most Canadians do not recognize that more than 70 percent of Quebecers are proud of Canadian achievements, that 65 percent think of themselves, in varying degrees, as Canadians, and over 80 percent want to reconcile with the rest of Canada and put the unity issue behind them.

But Quebecers want a renewed federalism, not a status quo.

There is, therefore, a very important role for the Canadian Jewish community to play in helping bring about beneficial changes to that status quo. It will help not only the Jews of Quebec, but all Canadians.

It is a role of understanding the aspirations of Quebecers, a role of appreciating, as we should be able to do, the needs of French Quebecers to protect their language and their culture and their distinctiveness. Certainly we, the Jewish people, should be sensitive to these desires.

The Montreal Jewish community looks to the Jews of Canada to play an active role in maintaining the unity of our country and to promote the type of change within Canada that will accommodate the understandable and legitimate aspirations of Quebecers and ease the irrational hardening of attitudes.

We must fight against anti-Quebec sentiment. We must convince others that making reasonable compromises would not only be fair, but would benefit the entire country. We must raise our voices, because, as our history has proven, we can and we must make a difference.

There are a number of steps we can advocate and adopt within our own respective communities across the country:

- We must support open dialogue, understanding and reasonable compromise.
- We must become involved in Canadian unity groups and encourage others to do so.
- We must travel to each other's communities and stimulate our children to do so, in order to understand and explain the special value of Quebec and the people of Quebec to Canada.
- We must remember that Montreal was an early stepping stone for Canadian Jewry and continues to play a critical role in providing leadership to our national and international Jewish organizations.
- We must individually and as organizations and communities get involved, speak up and commit to making a difference.

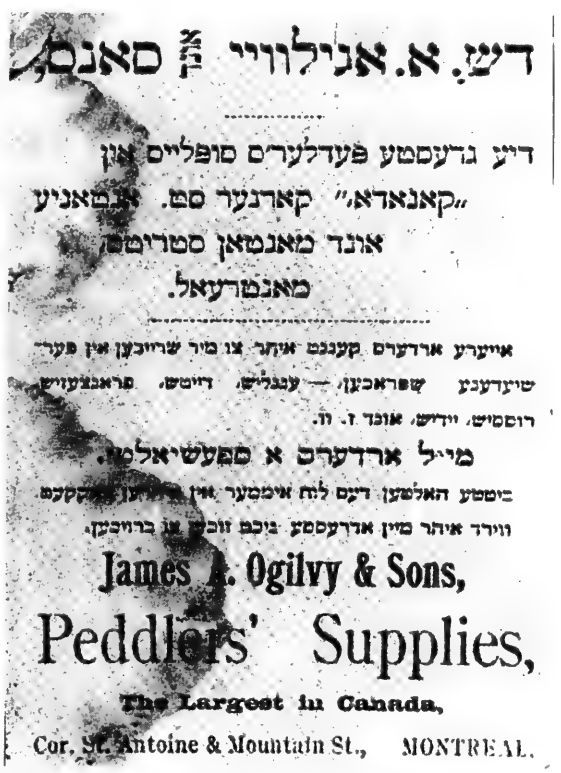
After all, if our collective responsibility as Jews can span oceans and continents, can it not easily span mountains and wheat fields, fishing coves and large cities, a mari usque ad mare, from one Canadian coast to the other?

We have survived as a people, partially because we have cared about each other. We have responded when called upon, no matter where in the world.

Now is the time for all of us to look more closely to home and respond to that call, at home.

We, the Jews of Montreal, look to you, the Jews across the country, to care about us, to do everything possible to help keep our country and our communities together.

We, the Jews of Montreal, seek and hope to find, with an open, understanding and caring heart, the sense of collective responsibility that has so distinguished us a people throughout our history.



The Jewish arrival in Quebec dates to the mid 1700s. Seen in this photo is an advertisement from an 1897 Yiddish calendar inviting Jewish pedlars to order their supplies from James A. Ogilvy & Sons of Montreal.

Unity government again on agenda

It's on the agenda again...or maybe it was never off. Will Labor join the Likud government to form a national unity coalition? Recent political developments have made the question relevant once more, but the basic considerations on either side have not changed much in the last few months.

By Shira Herzog in Toronto

Shimon Peres declared his interest in a national unity government as long ago as his defeat in the May 1996 election. His stated motive is to preserve the peace process in two ways — by forcing a rearticulation of the government's guidelines as the price for bringing him in, and by providing Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu with a broad public base of support for continued negotiations. Peres' personal interest in a seat at the cabinet table — an unspoken, but key motivation — has become even more urgent as June 3 approaches. On that day, the Labor party will elect its successor for leader of the party. Ehud Barak, former chief of staff of the IDF, is the likely winner in a race against three credible, popular politicians (Yossi Beilin, Efraim Sneh and Shlomo Ben-Ami). Peres knows that if he succeeds in joining the cabinet before June 3, he will retain his cabinet seat even after the leadership vote. But if he is out on June 3, he will find it much harder to get in after that date.

The Labor party is divided on the issue. Some argue that relinquishing their opposition role is a necessary price for ensuring the continuity of the peace negotiations. Others believe that a constructive opposition role is Labor's greatest contribution at this time, and that if Netanyahu cannot deliver on his own, he should be allowed to fail on his own. Barak is publicly opposed to the concept. A national unity government seriously weakens his chance of a victory against Netanyahu in the election for prime minister in the year 2000. Only a distinct role and voice between now and election day will provide Barak with the chance to mount a campaign that differentiates between his candidacy and that of the incumbent.

Netanyahu, for his part, has apparently been considering the option of a national unity government more seriously than in the past. If he goes ahead and invites Labor in, he will be in a different and stronger position as prime minister than his predecessors, Yitzhak Shamir and Shimon Peres, who rotated the prime ministership in their unity governments. Netanyahu will not share his seat with anyone, since in the new electoral system, he was elected directly by the people.

However, if he decides to move ahead with the talks, he may lose his parliamentary majority due to defections on the right. If he defers to his right wing, he may not be able to deliver on his promise to the centrist voters who elected him, on a promise of peace with security, in a belief that pragmatism would prevail over ideology in his government. A national unity government, based on a joint platform of peace, would give him the necessary public base for proceeding while enjoying a parliamentary majority. Netanyahu knows, as does as his rival Barak, that success on the peace front provides him a strong chance of success in the next election.

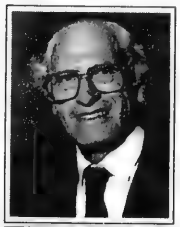
But it isn't so simple...Not only is Netanyahu naturally reticent to concede to Labor in any way, but he faces opposition in his own ranks. Two senior ministers, Yitzhak Mordechai, the minister of defence, and David Levy, the minister of foreign affairs, are also rivals in the constant political popularity contest. These portfolios might be on the block in a shared government arrangement. Mordechai, who has emerged as a strong, effective, moderate minister, has made it clear that he is not trading. It may be impossible for Netanyahu to proceed with a unity government, even if he wants one, because of these internal constraints.

To complicate things even further, a new public council, likely to be headed by Netanyahu's political mentor, Moshe Arens, has declared as its goal the reversal of the direct election of prime minister — the very system that gave Netanyahu power. Arens, who has long opposed the system, argues that rather than weakening bargaining power of the small parties, the new system has exacerbated the inherent difficulties of the coalition negotiation process. A spirited public debate that questions the role of prime minister in the existing system can only create a further challenge to the process of governance at this time.

If Netanyahu decides that a unity government is in his best interest, he and Peres may find themselves isolated from their natural political allies as they look for a way to strike the deal.

A glimmer of hope

When, some 30 years ago, I made a study of Austrian text books, I found the country to be in a state of denial with regard to its past. High school and other text books, when they came to the modern era and the world war, stated in a shorthand fashion: "During that time we were occupied by the Germans and much suffering ensued." Not a word about the fact that Austria welcomed Hitler in 1938 with open arms, and that in fact Hitler himself was an Austrian by birth. Nothing was said about the suffering of Austria's Jews, most of whom were murdered in the Holocaust.



By Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

In fact, the nation has had trouble facing the realities of the Nazi era, and for many years it did nothing to compensate the victims of its racial mania. Only lately has action been undertaken. Although Austria has had a prime minister of Jewish descent, its general treatment of Jews was something less than forthcoming. But some changes have taken place.

To be sure the old pre-war days can never be recovered — a Vienna with 59 synagogues, several rabbinic seminaries and world-renowned Jewish teachers, and its panoply of famous artists and writers, to say nothing of men like Sigmund Freud and, of course, the incomparable Theodor Herzl. That era is gone, but there are some glimmers of hope that Austria is recovering something of its erstwhile character.

It seems that many of its citizens have become alarmed over the persistence of anti-Semitism in the country and have taken initiatives to do something for Jews and to demonstrate that there is another Austria ready to face the sins of the past.

For several years now volunteers from all parts of the country and especially from Vienna have undertaken to restore the Jewish cemeteries that up till now have been in a generally dreadful condition. People from all walks of life, schoolchildren, policemen, soldiers and adults of various religions have given money and, even more important, their time and labor, to clear away the rubble and to restore the monuments and gravestones. So far some 10,000 graves have been refurbished and their inscriptions renewed. Commercial companies and other institutions have contributed of their funds, and in a number of instances paths have been cleared and trees have been donated and planted to give to the cemeteries once again an atmosphere of dignity and quiet beauty.

An organization entitled Schalom has the support of many citizens, led by federal president, Thomas Klestil. Meanwhile, Vienna's Jewish community is small and struggling. As yet, there is no bridge between yesterday and today. Some restitution payments have been made, but the kind of Jewish-gentile cooperation that for many years has taken place across Germany, is only in its first stages.

A glimmer of hope is now in evidence, and it may indeed be a kind of tragic irony that it is the dead and their resting places that have convinced growing numbers of Austrians that they must look at the past in order to secure their future.

Mysteries of Jewish identity

There is a broad spectrum of Jewish identity operating among North American Jews. Most Jews cluster around a large middle range. They are more, or less, observant; more, or less, involved with the community; more, or less, concerned with Israel; more, or less, interested in Jewish culture, and so on.

By Morton Weinfeld in Montreal

These Jews form the core of the community and are the battleground for the struggle of continuity. Not so for the Jews on the extremes. For those who are, let us say, to the "right" of modern Orthodox and extending towards chassidic groups, Jewish continuity is not an issue, at least for the next generation. Their children and likely their grandchildren will be Jews.

At the other end of the spectrum we have those Jews — and they would all identify as Jews (we ignore converts out of Judaism) — who have essentially broken off ties with the community. Most might be involved in mixed marriages. Both Judaism — whether as synagogue attendance or family ritual — and the organized Jewish community are no longer important to them.

They do not raise or educate their children as Jews. They would score low on most scales of Jewish identity. Here too there is no struggle. By and large (there are exceptions) they and most of their children will be lost to organized Jewish life in the future.

But as a social scientist who studies Jewish life, I find these two groups of Jews fascinating to ponder. While there is a substantial research tradition devoted to the study of chassidic Jews, much less effort has been devoted to studying the more numerous marginal, assimilated Jews. The "non-Jewish Jews" are intriguing precisely because in many cases, even as they are on their way out of the community, they retain vestigial or oblique ties to their Jewish identity and heritage. Thus the question to pose is: Why can't they just let go?

And even those who try to let go, to eradicate all Jewish ties, may often not quite make it. Indeed this is one of the staples of Jewish humor: "A wealthy but totally assimilated — in the closet — Jew never gave a dime to the Appeal. The top canvasser is sent to his home. The Jew vociferously and self-righteously denies his Jewishness. "I am not Jewish, my wife is not Jewish, my children are not Jewish, and even my late father, alav ha'shalom, was not Jewish.'"

Bob is a New Yorker, who had a bar mitzvah in an Orthodox synagogue and proudly identifies as a Jew. But since then, he has had no Jewish involvements at all. He married a non-Jewish woman, observes no Jewish holidays in any way and has no ties of any kind to organized Jewish life. Yet whenever we communicate by phone or e-mail, or when we meet at conferences, he displays a concerned familiarity with current Jewish issues and controversies. There is no New York Times article on a Jewish topic or on Israel, that Bob would not read. This is clearly Bob's way of not letting go.

Some Jews might argue that assimilation can never really be complete. Their view is that Jewishness is primordial and at worst will lie dormant, a spark which can burst into flame at the right time. (The 1967 war played such a catalytic role for some Jews.) Thus they have a hard time believing that technical non-Jews with Jewish ancestry, like American Secretary of State Madeleine Albright, do not share some bond with Jewish experience. Even their denial is seen as a form of Jewish expression! We should realize that at root those kinds of beliefs reflect a racial or biological view of Jewish life and identity.

This is the attraction behind efforts at "outreach" aimed at Jews who have strayed from the community. Each such person is a potential baal tshuvah awaiting the right connection to return to the fold. Despite the many attempts by Jewish communal organizations to launch successful outreach programs, there is no hard evidence about the numbers of Jews, such as partners in mixed marriages who have made a deliberate return back to Jewish life.

But it is worth an effort, since many such Jews have left the door slightly open. They may be fond of some element of Jewish culture or Jewish food. They may find themselves with a larger than expected number of Jewish friends. They may be hypersensitive about anti-Semitism. Some simply like the "idea" that they are of Jewish origin.

These Jews are worthy of more study by researchers of modern Jewish life. Most readers of this column know such Jews. They are as likely as anyone to be exemplary human beings. But we should not romanticize their potential as contributors to the struggle for Jewish survival.

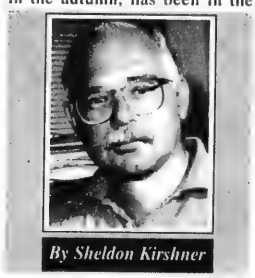
Le Pen steeped in pathology of anti-Semitism



By Sheldon Kirshner

The far-right National Front (NF), which marks the 25th anniversary of its founding in the autumn, has been in the news of late.

Last November, the mayor of Toulon, a member of the NF, triggered an uproar by refusing to honor Marek Halter — a Jewish writer and a Holocaust survivor — at a local book fair.

Less than two months later, the NF won control of Vitrolles, a suburb of Marseilles, the fourth municipality in southern France to fall into its hands.

In early March, Jean Marie Le Pen, the leader of the NF, was quoted as having said in a new book that President Jacques Chirac was controlled by Jewish organizations, particularly the B'nai B'rith.

Last week, the NF held its 10th congress in Strasbourg, the Alsatian capital where 25 percent of the population voted for Le Pen in the last French presidential election two years ago.

In that election, Le Pen won 15 percent of the vote, a feat which established him as a force to be reckoned with in French politics. And although Le Pen's chances of winning the presidency outright are exceedingly slim, his xenophobic party is already a major player on the local, regional and national scene.

Harvey Simmons, the chair of York University's political science department, does not underestimate Le Pen's appeal. In a recently-published book, The French National Front (Westview Press, $19.95 US), he describes it as "the most popular and dangerous extreme right political party in Western Europe" today.

To Simmons, a Socialist and a Jew, the ideology of the NF is permeated by anti-Semitism, racism and hostility to parliamentary democracy. Its rhetoric, he believes, has contributed to growing public hostility to Muslim and African immigrants and caused deep-seated concern among Jews.

Despite his denials, Le Pen is a visceral anti-Semite, and "he lies when he claims he isn't," declared Simmons in an interview. "What do you say about a man whose closest friends are anti-Semites?"

And as Simmons points out in his thoroughly-researched book, the NF wraps its anti-Semitism in a "fog of code words and coded phrases."

In his instructive survey of the NF, Simmons places it within the continuum of the French radical right, and Le Pen in a line of demogogues from Edouard Drumont to Charles Maurras.

The extreme right flourished in the late 19th century and early 20th century and reached its apotheosis during the Vichy period. In the wake of World War II, the ideology was marginalized by disclosures about the Holocaust. But attitudes began to change after the Six Day War in 1967, when, at a celebrated press conference, President Charles de Gaulle referred to Jews as "an elite people, sure of itself and dominating."

Founded several years after his infamous performance, the NF has traded on de Gaulle's insinuations, though not always openly. And according to Simmons, the NF's essential message is rooted in traditional anti-Semitism.

In the eyes of its supporters and sympathizers, Simmons writes, "the Jew stood for modernity as opposed to tradition, the Republic as opposed to monarchy, equality as opposed to hierarchy, cosmopolitanism as opposed to rootedness, parliamentary democracy as opposed to authoritarianism, and capitalism as opposed to corporatism."

Le Pen has consistently rejected accusations of anti-Semitism. But in fact, as Simmons proves, he is steeped in its pathology. He associates with some of France's most notorious anti-Semites, some of whom are members in good standing of the NF, and he has not bothered to distance himself from their anti-Jewish diatribes.

More to the point, Le Pen has never been loathe to vent his feelings about Jews. Two of his closest friends, his personal physicians, have accused him of anti-Semitism. And his ex-wife, Pierette, has quoted him as saying: "Hitler was a jerk with his gas chambers. He fouled up. For the Jews, I would have used giant crushers; it would have been quicker and final."

Much earlier in his career, Le Pen said: "Everybody has a right to a country, and each people must have a nation. But that doesn't imply the takeover of French politics by lobbies. Israel must exist, not the Jewish lobby. The large number of Jews in the areas of information and politics implies a certain pressure of a cosmopolitan tendency. Thus, contrary to national interests, these people always oppose nationalism and the idea of nation."

Le Pen's view of the Holocaust is just as disturbing. "I don't say that the gas chambers didn't exist," he said in 1987. "I wasn't able to see them myself. I haven't especially studied the question.

Jean Marie Le Pen

But I believe that it (the gas chambers) is a point of detail in the history of the Second World War."

Not surprisingly, Le Pen has few kind words for Israel. In 1992 he accused "those who demand secure and recognized frontiers for Israel" of wanting to "destroy those of France." And in a previous statement, he called Israel an "artificial state" created by American and British oil interests.

(Le Pen's ignorance is abysmal. Had he exhibited even an inkling of knowledge, he would have realized that Western oil companies were staunchly pro-Arab and firmly opposed to Israel's creation. But that, too, I suppose, is a mere "detail.")

Le Pen's associates labor under similar prejudices. During the 1991 Gulf War, Jean-Claude Martinez, a member of the NF's political bureau, commented: "The American intervention was done to assure Israel's survival and Israeli domination over the region."

Being a cynical anti-Semite like Le Pen, Martinez glosses over Washington's vital interest in preserving its unimpeded access to Middle Eastern oil supplies, the sole reason for its declaration of war against Saddam Hussein of Iraq.

Simmons does not know whether the majority of NF voters are anti-Semites. But his data suggests that 53 percent of its electorate is male, while 39 percent is between the ages of 18 to 34. Twenty four percent, he adds, identify themselves as either middle-level professionals or employees, 26 percent as workers and 21 percent as inactive or retired.

Two additional features distinguish the typical NF voter. Fifty nine percent consider themselves non-practising Catholics and 60 percent view immigration as an integral issue. (With France's unemployment rate running at almost 13 percent, Le Pen has exploited this issue to the hilt, having forced the government to crack down on illegal immigration.)

Barring drastic circumstances, the NF is doomed to remain in opposition. But if it wins national power, Simmons foresees turmoil. As he puts it: "As we look to the future, it is difficult to avoid the conclusion that an NF government would destabilize democracy."

And, he notes, a regime headed by Le Pen would have an extremely negative impact on French Jews, probably prompting some to emigrate.

Understanding the past

The Oxford Companion to Archaeology*, edited by Brian Fagan (Oxford University Press, $59.95).
Eyewitness to Discovery*, edited by Brian Fagan (Oxford University Press, $34.95).

Archeology conjures up in our minds a world of adventure and romance, a clutch of spectacular finds: the legendary city of Troy, Tutankhamen's golden tomb, the Dead Sea Scrolls, the mile high city at Machu Picchu and Ninevah of the Assyrians.

The image of the archeologist as a person who searches for lost cities in the depths of the jungle and uncovers ancient tombs buried in the desert has provided Hollywood with spectacular material including Dr. Indiana Jones in Raiders of the Lost Ark or the Temple of Doom.

A historian once wrote that "the past is a foreign country; they do things differently there." Archeology is an attempt to understand that past — often across vast stretches of time — and to discover how things were done differently by diverse peoples in many corners of the globe. It attempts by scientific methods to recover and study material evidence of life and culture from previous ages.

This is assuredly one of humanity's most intriguing pursuits and The Oxford Companion to Archeology must be the ultimate reference work on the subject. The range of material covered in this volume of 800 pages is astonishing: everything from the domestication of the camel to Egyptian hieroglyphics, from the ruins of Pompeii, the mystery of Stonehenge and the strangeness of Easter Island to the Pyramids of Giza, Maya civilization, Greek art and architecture, the Great Wall of China and the origin of human speech and language.

An article on ancient synagogues reveals that the oldest known structure dates from the first century BCE on the Greek island of Delos. Two of the most singular Diaspora synagogues are located at Dura Europos in Syria and at Sardis in modern Turkey. In Dura Europos (3rd century CE) the walls were covered with elaborate paintings depicting biblical scenes.

At Sardis, the influential Jewish community from the fourth to the fifth centuries CE, built a monumental structure within a Roman bath and a gymnasium complex.

The lengthy article on Jerusalem describes archeological evidences in the city from the reign of David to the expulsion of the Crusaders by Saladin in the 12th Century.

The 700 articles provide a colorful and informative journey into the human past, as well as a necessary introduction to the community roots of human beings, their similarities and differences, and of societies, past and present.

In Eyewitness to Discovery the editor has gathered 55 vivid accounts of some of the world's greatest archeological discoveries, told by the men and women who made them. They include the following:

• In 1867, Charles Warren excavated under the Temple Mount in Jerusalem. This was the first scientific research of this kind carried out in the Holy City.

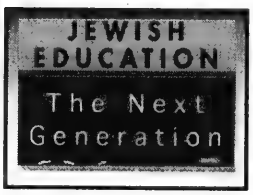
• From 1922-1934, Leonard Wooley excavated the Royal Cemetery at Ur (Iraq), birthplace of Abraham, which was in its heyday in the 3rd millennium BCE.

• Donald Johnson, in 1974, came upon the fragmentary bones in Ethiopia of "Lucy," a discovery that pushed back the boundaries of human evolution to a time 3 million years ago.

• A Bedouin youth in 1947, searching for a lost goat, entered a cave full of jars containing scrolls wrapped in linen cloth, near Quaran by the Dead Sea.

• Two bikers, in 1991, in the Tyrolian Alps, stumbled upon 5,000 year old Otzi, the Ice Man, the earliest European corpse to survive. It revealed a mine of information about Bronze Age diet, disease and genetic makeup.

Fascinated readers will find excitement in the astonishing and varied discoveries and as they are brought face-to-face with the triumphs and tragedies of those who have gone before.



Values begin at home

By DR. ELLIOTT MALAMET

Witness the following account by the sociologist David Schoem, who sat in on a class in a Jewish afternoon school in an upper-middle class American community:

"In what was a typical classroom lesson, a seventh grade teacher asked the students to describe in what ways the Sabbath differed from other days of the week. In response to a student's answer that 'on the Sabbath we pray,' the teacher said, 'but you pray every day.'

"In this case, not only was the teacher's response completely detached from reality, but the student who answered was also speaking in theoretical terms. Many of the students in the class had not been to a prayer service on the Sabbath for up to six months or more.

"When the teacher, who managed a restaurant on Friday evenings, then began to speak about why we don't work on the Sabbath, the students giggled incredulously because of the question's absurdity. Clearly, this lesson that was being discussed in first person terms was, in the student's minds, about a people that was far removed from their own reality."

Schoem spent one year observing classes. His recording of the comments of the students is very telling: "They teach you the same thing over again and over again and over again and over again." "I think Hebrew school is dumb. I mean we don't learn anything."

As the Talmud notes, much of what a child says can ultimately be traced to their parents' influence, an idea perfectly exemplified in this description by a very influential board member of the school in question: "Hebrew school is a boring thing. The goal is the bar mitzvah. And when they stand on the bimah, you don't want them to embarrass you or themselves. Okay? That's where it really is."

Although you might argue that such schools are an extreme example of Jewish alienation, I tend to think that they are far more the rule than we'd like to think.

It is very in vogue today to talk about how kids who receive a Jewish — especially a day school — education have a better shot at maintaining their Jewish identities than their peers. This is often true but in a complex way. A day school education can help stave off assimilation down the road, but it requires more than that to ensure a committed next generation.

Ask your children how many of them intend to continue a regular form of Torah study — once a week? once a month? — after they leave afternoon school or even day school. If they say they're not sure, then you've already been handed the sad facts — all those years of Jewish education and they're still not certain it's worth it.

Schools work best when they mirror an ethic of serious Jewish involvement and study that is stressed in the child's home. Without the sense in a child's mind that the values he/she receives at school are echoed in the home environment, a Jewish education can often be a bitter parody, a comic satire of the real facts of the child's Jewish existence. If something is important for our children to have, then it's important for us to have as parents. I call on every parent reading this column to resume or continue to pursue your Jewish education on a weekly basis, starting immediately.

Hey kids, it's midnight on the assimilation clock. Do you know where your parents are?

Passover a symbol of universal freedom

By RABBI LAWRENCE M. COLTON

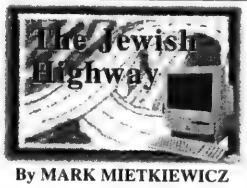
In the episode retelling of the deliverance of the Hebrews from slavery in Egypt, the Passover saga presents to the world the paradigm for the hope of all. Passover becomes the symbol of a universal freedom that can be idealized, stylized and transformed into a redemptive act. Can any group, no matter how well intended, internalize, actualize and define that object feeling felt at the precise moment "...of the going forth from slavery into freedom?"

It seems that the constant retelling from year to year might have just the opposite effect. The collective eye grows dim, the imagination wanes and the experience which motivates the Passover seder is easily shunned aside. In an age of impersonal impulses, economic uncertainty and politicized expediency, the only way one can relive Passover is to actually will himself into the business of human empathy, understanding and honesty. It is not just a vain attempt to say. "Look at me, I care!" It is not just hyperbole to lay claim to taking upon your shoulders the social responsibility of those prophets of old of our sages who extorted us to really sample the distress of others.

Passover, with all of its saintly preparations, halachot and issurim, occupies a central place in the motif of Jewish existence. It is the knowledge that one can be enslaved by many forms of slavery that worries and unsettles the critically thinking human being. Psychologists and sociologists call living the game of one-upmanship. In the game of the mastery of one over another the temptation to be in control is very great. I submit, don't we all play the game at one time or another? The great impulse to think only in global terms of a slavery obviates and makes foolish the need to understand what we are seeking to preserve. Slavery takes place one soul at a time. The fact that others are imprisoned matters little to the hurt and broken soul who is put down, denied and abused. We enslave others daily in the marketplace of our business world, our families, in the classroom and even, I dare say, in the highest centres of Jewish institutionalism.

"This year we are slaves; next year may we be free." Where does it all begin? As the Midrash teaches, just as the Red (Reed) Sea did not split until the Israelites stepped into it, so redemption (human empathy) cannot come unless you take the first step.

Rabbi Colton is the spiritual leader of Congregation Temple Sinai in Toronto.



Holiday has special relationship with cleaning and food

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Every Jewish holiday has a unique tie to its own festive food, but nothing rivals Passover's obsession with food, from cleaning and shopping to cooking and eating. Today, we'll look at this special relationship with food as we travel the Jewish Highway.

One of the rituals that unites Jews everywhere is the endless cleaning, scrubbing and scouring that means Pesach is almost upon us. But do we ever stop to think about what we are really trying to get rid of?

Yisrael Rice's Passover Lantern [http://linex.com/~yrice/passover.html] offers several insights into ridding ourselves of chametz, both philosophical and practical. You'll also find a clear explanation of where chametz can lurk in your home and how to get rid of it.

If you're looking for cleaning help from your children, then have them read the tips at Kids Klean for Pesach [http://www.jer1.co.il/city_services/holidays/pesach/home.htm] This well-designed site is practically guaranteed to motivate your children to pitch in and tackle the massive clean-up. (Well, we can dream, can't we?)

No matter how great a housecleaner you are, it's impossible to get rid of all your chametz. So there is a tradition to sell your remaining chametz to a non-Jew during Passover. In a very clever move, Yisrael Rice offers an electronic Chametz Contract [http://linex.com/~yrice/chamcont.html] so you can sell your leaven on-line.

Shopping for Passover can be a confusing and frustrating experience. Two recommended sites which try to explain what to look for are Kashrus Conscience [http://www.jewish.org/kashrut.bulletin.html] and the Orthodox Union's Passover Directory [http://www.ou.org/chagim/pesach/pesachguide/].

Now that the house is clean and the shopping has been done, it's time to cook. Let's start with some basics. If you're searching for classic recipes for gefilte fish, chicken soup or matzah balls (knaidlach), you can find them at Passover on the Net [http://www.holidays.net/passover/recipes.htm].

But there are also many sites that are much more daring. Kosher Express [http://www.marketnet.com/kosher/recipes.html] will tell you how to prepare Passover cupcake blintzes, quick pan-fried spinach frittatas, Passover jam buttons and much more. For some Sephardi vegetarian recipes, don't miss A Sephardic Passover Seder [http://www.vegkitchen.com/sephardic.shtml]. (Please note that some of these recipes include ingredients such as peas which traditionally are not eaten by Ashkenazi Jews during Passover [http://www.jewish.org/kashrut.bulletin.html#kitniyos].)

For more unconventional dishes, try the gigantic Jewish-Food Passover Archives [http://www.eskimo.com/~jefffree/recipes/pasindex.htm] where you can help yourself to recipes for chicken with sun-dried tomatoes and shiitake mushrooms, Corsican paupiettes, and 14 varieties of charoset including California, Egyptian, pear and raisin, Venetian and Yemenite, and seven-fruit charoset from Surinam. I guess after sampling 14 varieties of charoset, it might be time to try the weight watcher matzah souffle [http://www.eskimo.com/~jefffree/recipes/passouf.htm].

Actually, you can escape the mega-oil mega-egg fat laden dishes if you cook creatively. (Even Philip Goldwasser's mother doesn't buy 20 dozen eggs like she used to [http://www.jcn18.com/food/bt10.htm].) At Vegetarian Fatfree Passover Recipes [http://web.mit.edu/yaron/www/passover.html] you'll find out how to make healthy brownies, cabbage souffle pudding and English trifle.

But if you are still looking for the ultimate salt-free, fat-free, almost-everything-free food, there's always matzah. While most of us get ours from the supermarket, David L. Kline has outlined the complicated and stringent halachot that must be followed in order to bake kosher for Passover matzot [http://www.shamash.org/reform/uahc/congs/la/la002/matsah.html].

So now that the house is clean, the shopping is done, the cooking is underway and the matzah is ready, what's left? Next week in my final pre-Pesach column...we drink!

Silver leaves 'legacy of tzedakah' behind

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Nathan Silver, philanthropist, Toronto builder and developer and founder of Metro Ontario Ltd., died March 30 at his home in Jerusalem at the age of 82. He devoted his life to Jewish communal service.

Obituary

Born in Warsaw, Silver arrived in Canada in 1934, where he sold dried mushrooms and cutlery imported from Poland.

During World War II, he served in the Canadian Army as a gunner in an artillery division. On his return to Toronto, he entered a partnership with builder and land developer Louis Shields. In the 1950s, he started his own construction and land development business.

"There wasn't a nicer or more honest and down to earth person than Nat," said Ralph Fromer, whose friendship with Silver goes back to 1935.

"Even as a boy, when he didn't have a penny to his name, he had a lot of self-confidence and was always there to help his friends."

Fromer recalls that during the war, Silver was instrumental in helping Jewish former internees who were living under difficult conditions in Canada. "He helped place them in homes and found jobs for them."

Lewis Moses, who was Silver's accountant and friend, said Silver raised large amounts of money for Israel and served as president of the Zionist Revisionist Organization of Canada. He was also active in the Zionist youth organization, Betar.

"Nat was one of the most dedicated Jews I ever knew," said Moses.

"He participated in all segments of the Jewish community. He and his wife Lily were one of the most dedicated Jewish couples in both Canada and Israel, giving generously of themselves and their means."

Nat and Lily Silver were associates and close personal friends of Menachem Begin and his wife Aliza.

Silver served as campaign chair of the United Jewish Appeal, headed the State of Israel Bonds campaign and was the honoree at the Jewish National Fund's 1967 Negev Dinner. He served on many boards, including those at Beth Tzedec Congregation and the Zionist Organization of Canada. He was a generous supporter of Ezrath Nashim-Herzog Hospital in Israel and a strong supporter of Jewish education.

"Nat was one of the stalwarts of the Canadian Zionist family," said Kurt Rothschild, president of the Canadian Zionist Federation. "His loyalty to Israel, his courageous stand, his aliyah and his great generosity all made him one of our outstanding leaders and made him a great Zionist."

The Silvers made aliyah in the early 1970s. Their home in Jerusalem was a meeting place for politicians, communal leaders, business associates and friends. In Israel, the Silvers continued their communal service and charitable work. On their frequent trips to Toronto, they remained involved with numerous causes.

Harry Wolle, chair of the central region of Likud Canada, recalled Silver as "a dedicated family man, a mentsh in every sense of the word for family, community and as a world citizen. Nat was a very special person. I've never heard anyone either in his business world or the Jewish community say a negative thing about him. He loved Israel and he played a very important part in the Herut organization both in Canada and in Israel, even before it became the Likud Party."

Steven Ain, executive vice-president of the United Israel Appeal of Canada, said Silver was "one of the most committed people to Israel and to world Jewry that I have ever met."

He is mourned by his wife Lily, sister Charlotte Silverberg, children Shoel and Eileen, Debra and Yossi Karta, Joey, and Bonnie and Eyal Ranen and 10 grandchildren.

Funeral services and shivah were held in Israel. Among those attending the funeral were Knesset members Benny Begin, Uzi Landau, Reuven Rivlin, Rabbi Abraham Feder, former Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Shamir; Moshe Arens, Zev Bielski, mayor of Ra'ananna; Pinchas Wallerstein, chairman of the Council of Settlements of Judea, Samaria and Gaza; Leo Goldhar, chair of Toronto's UJA campaign; and Ted Sokolsky, Toronto UJA campaign director.

In the eulogy to his father, Shoel Silver said "We, his children and grandchildren, have been left a legacy of tzedakah and gemilut chassidim. We pledge to carry it on, to honor his memory and the shem tov which he earned, and which will endure."

Soban joins Thornhill race

VAUGHAN — Sid Soban, a retired teacher and small businessman, has announced he will run as an independent in the new riding of Thornhill in the next federal election.

And the Reform party this week is expected to announce that Aurel David will be their candidate in Thornhill.

Soban, 60, says he's running as an independent because both federal Tory leader Jean Charest and Finance Minister Paul Martin have adopted the same policies of former prime minister Brian Mulroney that they had criticized while in opposition.

Soban's platform includes job creation; restoring and strengthening Canada's social safety net, health care and education systems; and a fairer tax structure.

David, a Romanian-born dentist, was expected to be acclaimed as Reform's hopeful in Thornhill following an uncontested nomination race.

He and Soban will run against Liberal candidate Elinor Caplan, a former Ontario cabinet minister; and Tory hopeful Bill Fisch, a Markham councillor.

The NDP has yet to announce a date for a nomination meeting in Thornhill.

The new riding is expected to be 25 to 35 percent Jewish.

Bonds to honor Pachter

TORONTO — Sara Pachter will be honored by State of Israel Bonds on May 21, at 7 p.m. at Holy Blossom Temple, 1950 Bathurst Street.

The evening will celebrate the travel agent and community activist's long service to Israel. It will feature the Three Cantors, an exhibit of photographs from trips to Israel, celebrity guests and a catered dinner. Special guest is Moshe Katsav, deputy minister and minister for tourism.

Pachter has led 132 trips to Israel, and has been honored by El Al and the Israel government. She was the only Canadian sent to Israel after the Six Day War, and led three groups during the Gulf War. Among her achievements is introducing the children and grandchildren of her earlier clients to Israel.

Tickets are $54. Call Rose Shapiro at 416-789-3351. Dietary laws will be observed and families are welcome. Admission is by individual investment of a 1997 State of Israel Bond and a new bond investment is eligible for a draw for two round trip tickets to Israel, courtesy of El Al Airlines.

MANDEL LEADS 1998 WOMEN'S CAMPAIGN

Agi Mandel is the new Chair of UJA Federation's Women's Campaign. She was officially installed with the other 1998 executive members last week.

Outgoing Campaign Chair Vicki Campbell handed over the top leadership position to Mandel, a veteran UJA Federation volunteer and 1997 Vice-Chair.

In bidding farewell, Campbell spoke proudly of the nearly $4 million raised by Women's Campaign and the close to 500 new gifts collected for the 1997 Campaign.

"The feelings, passions and dreams I fulfilled throughout this year," Campbell said, "will always be a great source of joy and pride to me."

Mandel recounted her family's heroic story of emigration from Czechoslovakia to the West in 1950. "My community involvement is the direct result of the values I learned at home," she explained. The new Chair expressed her deep appreciation for her new role. "It is an honour to associate my name with the good works of UJA Federation," she said.

Marlene Axmith, past Chair of Women's Campaign installed the 1998 Board and Portfolio Coordinators Maura Cooperberg, Rosalie Flomen, Cheryl Jackson and Carole Sterling. Axmith also installed Judy Engel as the 1998 Women's Campaign Vice-Chair.

Jill Reitman, who is carrying out the second year of her term as President of Jewish Women's Federation, thanked the 1997 Women's Campaign executive for forging closer ties with JWF. She also congratulated JWF Vice-Presidents Danita Dubinsky Aziza, Janice Langer, Susan Michaels and Ellen Kachuck Rosenbluth for their commitment and dedication in representing thousands of Jewish women.

A Matter of Class

A Matter of Class is a regular column profiling Jewish supplementary schools affiliated with the Board of Jewish Education of UJA Federation.

The secret to the success of Shaar Shalom School is the philosophy that learning can and should be fun.

"Kids really like coming here because we provide them with creative ways to explore Judaism," says Principal Karen Goodis. "We try to make learning enjoyable and that makes our students want to come to class."

The school, which runs from kindergarten to grade 8 and operates out of Thornhill Secondary School has a formal curriculum which includes Hebrew prayer and reading, Tanach stories, holidays and Jewish community. In addition, students can take part in special programs such as a four week art course open to grades three through seven, focusing on Jewish heroes. Goodis says the program, which runs through the month of February, "is a great way to beat the February blahs."

A special grade four class explores the Jewish community from synagogues to social agencies, and as a follow-up, grade five students can take part in a mini-mission to experience the community first-hand.

Shaar Shalom students Cassie Crangle (right) and Monica Smiley beat the February blahs.

Family education is also a Shaar Shalom feature. Parents are invited to participate in at least one program a year up to grade five and four programs in grades six and seven.

Goodis emphasizes that students of different ages often mix through these special events. "Kids really enjoy having the opportunity to relate to people outside the class," explains Goodis. "The teachers like the change too."

A new pilot project being launched next year in grade seven will prepare bar and bat mitzva students for Jewish adulthood. In addition to regular weekly classes, the group will meet on Shabbat for congregational prayer. "Instead of just learning about praying the kids will get to apply what they've learned in a real setting," notes Goodis.

Supplementary Schools affiliated with the Board of Jewish Education include:

Adath Israel Religious School, Beaches Hebrew Institute, Beit Rayim, Bet Sefer Solel, Beth Habonim Religious School, Beth Sholom Congregational School, Beth Tikvah Congregational School, Beth Tzedec Congregational School, B'nai Shalom Hebrew School, Chabad Lubavitch of Markham, Darchei Noam Hebrew School, Downtown Jewish Community School, Har Tikvah Congregational School, Hillel Children's Workshop, Holy Blossom Religious School, Jewish Russian Centre Hebrew School, Kadima School, Ohalei Yosef Yitzchak, Orah School, Oraynu, Petach Tikvah Talmud Torah, Shaar Shalom School, Temple Emanu-El School, Temple Har Zion School, Temple Kol Ami School, Temple Sinai School, Tikvat Hayim, United Congregational Schools, Village Shul, West Toronto Jewish School.

COMMUNITY LOSES WELL LOVED LEADER

Nathan Silver, known for his charity, modesty and kindness, recently passed away at his home in Jerusalem at age 82.

Although he and his wife Lil made aliya more than 25 years ago, Silver's unrelenting commitment to Toronto's Jewish community will be remembered for years to come.

During the 50's and 60's, Silver, a real estate developer who founded the Metrontario Group, served for several years as a board member and in 1969 as chairman of United Jewish Appeal, the predecessor to UJA Federation. He was also president of Herut Canada, the Canadian counterpart of Israel's Likud Party, the national vice-president of the Jewish National Fund and the 1967 JNF Negev Dinner honouree. After moving to Israel with his wife and three of his four children in 1974, Silver remained active as chairman of United Israel Appeal's Residents Committee - a body which oversees UIA/UJA Federation funded projects in Israel.

Silver's close Likud ties nurtured a very warm relationship with former Israeli Prime Minister Menachem Begin. In fact, Begin considered Silver one of his closest friends and confidants.

Here in Toronto, Silver will be remembered for his strong commitment and contribution to Jewish education. He was instrumental in building the Finch Avenue branch of Associated Hebrew Schools, served on several school committees and was honoured as a lifetime member of the Associated board of directors.

Nathan Silver

"Even when he moved to Israel he remained completely devoted," recalls Arthur Tannenbaum, former executive director of Associated Hebrew Schools. "The man never said the word no!"

Silver also made a major contribution to the adult education program at Beth Tzedec Congregation, where he and his wife were members for more than 40 years.

"Silver was a mensch in the true sense of the word," notes Harry Wolle, who became friends with him while they were both members of the Betar Zionist Youth Organization. "Nat always brought out the best in people."

Dr. Arnold Epstein, a fellow United Jewish Welfare Fund volunteer, called Silver an "ardent Zionist, excellent community member and a good friend."

Many prominent dignitaries, including former Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Shamir and ex-Defence Minister Moshe Arens, attended Silver's funeral in Beit Shemesh. Among many Torontonians present were UJA Federation Campaign Chair Leo Goldhar and Campaign Director Ted Sokolsky.

Menachem Begin's son Benny, a close family friend, delivered the eulogy and Rabbi Avraham Feder, formerly of Toronto's Beth Tikvah Synagogue conducted prayers.

Silver is survived by his wife Lil, sister Charlotte and children Shoel, Debra, Joey and Bonnie.

Walk offers 4 tickets to Israel

Participants in this year's UJA Federation Walk for Israel on Sunday, May 25 and the community Festival that follows will have a chance to win four round trip tickets to Israel.

Two tickets on El Al Israel Airlines will be awarded to an individual whose name is drawn from among those who raise at least $100 for the Walk. A participant's name will be entered in the draw for every $100 collected.

In addition, five dollar raffle tickets, which offer an opportunity to win an Air Canada flight for two to Israel are being sold now. The winning entry will be drawn at the Festival. Tickets can be purchased by calling (416) 631-5700.

This year's Walk features two separate routes at two separate times, which is expected to bring out more people to the community's most popular annual event.

1996 Walk participants enjoy a sunny spring day as they make their way down Bathurst Street towards Centennial Centre.

Route one leaves the Promenade Shopping Centre (Bathurst, north of Clark) at 10:30 a.m., with the second departing from the Bathurst Jewish Centre (Bathurst north of Sheppard) at 12:30 p.m. Both routes will end at North York's Centennial Centre on Finch, west of Bathurst, where the Festival will run from 11:00 a.m. to 3:30 p.m.

"This year's Stepping Out for Israel Festival, which is free for everyone, will be even better than last year's," predicts Marcy Kroach, who is co-chairing the event with Corey Mandell and Tracy Rain.

Mandell, who has been lending his company's support to the Festival for 7 years, thinks it's "a really great way to bring the whole community together."

Among the new Festival attractions are virtual reality machines, a Sony Play Station and the biggest line-up of live main stage entertainment in Festival history provided by Mandell Entertainment Group.

Funds raised at the Walk go to new immigrant children arriving in Israel. Last year more than 7,000 participants turned out for the Walk and Festival.

Eilat mayor praises local community

The Mayor of Eilat was in Toronto recently for a crash course on the inner workings of Toronto's Jewish community. He liked what he saw.

Gabi Kadosh was accompanied by Bilu Mishori, Chairman of the Eilot Regional Council, Leah Golan, a planner with the UJA Federation funded Jewish Agency and Amnon Shinar, Director of the United Israel Appeal office in Israel.

During the last ten years Toronto's Jewish community, through UJA Federation's Project Renewal and Partnership 2000 initiatives, has sponsored many important projects in Eilat and the surrounding Eilot region. This was the first time the Israeli Partnership 2000 Steering Committee came to Toronto.

Kadosh said support from Toronto's Jewish community has "significantly improved the quality of life for thousands of Eilat residents." The mayor attributed a zero drop out rate in the city's elementary school system to student support programs funded by UJA Federation.

After visiting several agencies, schools and synagogues, Kadosh commented on the "outstanding infrastructure" of Toronto's Jewish community and the "high quality" of the Jewish education system.

Additional cooperation between Toronto and Eilat-Eilot is being planned in areas such as curriculum sharing and environmental studies programs for Toronto students at the Eilat College.

Support for national unity government high: researcher

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The time has come for a national unity government in Israel, a Tel Aviv University researcher said here recently.

"Sixty percent of Israelis support a national unity government according to recent polls," said Dr. Joshua Teitelbaum of the Moshe Dayan Centre for Middle Eastern and African Studies.

"Within Israel, the two main parties must stop bickering. We need a united front."

A distinction should be made between "peace" with Arab countries and "normalization," Teitelbaum said, adding that there cannot be peace without the benefits of normal relations. "That's the way it is with Egypt and I can live with that."

He said there are signs that Arabs are changing their attitudes to Israel for the better and in any case, "we must take risks" for peace.

"I have doubts whether Palestinians in the street are as reconciled to Israel as are its [Palestinian] leaders ," he said. "This is where Canadians can help. Please support projects with Arab components. I encourage you to study Arabic as well as Hebrew. You'll be amazed at the similarities."

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu was not elected because Israelis were opposed to the peace process, "but because they wanted to slow it down."

He was optimistic about common ground between the Likud and Labor parties, pointing out that well respected leaders of both, acting with the government's knowledge, have already come to an agreement that a Palestinian state could have a governing centre in a suburb of Jerusalem. They also agree to the partition of greater Israel, he said.

Responding to questions, Teitelbaum said, "we have to make it in Arafat's interest to crack down on the militants, because obviously he has lifted the lid a little."

Any attempt by the Palestinian Authority to use weapons against Israel would be answered by "massive" retaliation by Israel, he said.

Asked about the decision to go ahead with the Har Choma housing project, he said a Labor government under Shimon Peres would have delayed it. "Netanyahu succumbed to domestic internal political pressure."

The far-right, religious and secular supporters of the government and settlers are disappointed that the government has not been able to curb terrorism, but the majority of voters who supported Netanyahu are not disappointed with its record.

The address was sponsored by the Institute for International Affairs of B'nai Brith Canada, Canadian Friends of Tel Aviv University and Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue.

Jews cannot control hatred against them: Wisse

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The Arab-Israeli conflict has nothing to do with Israel's size, says a professor of Yiddish and comparative literature at Harvard University.

"The war has to do with Israel's sovereign presence, not with how much land it occupies," Ruth Wisse said at a recent lecture sponsored by the new leadership division of State of Israel Bonds.

It is "terrifying," she said, that Jews have no control of the hatred against them. "If the hatred is directed at our existence then there is no way we can change anything except to cease to exist."

Although she is not against negotiations with the Arabs, Wisse said "any sane person can see that a small Israel would be a greater temptation than a larger Israel."

Wisse, author of If I Am Not For Myself: The Liberal Betrayal of the Jews, spoke on Liberalism or Judaism: A Time to Choose.

She said that as a sovereign people, Jews have "built a magnificent society, which has become a model nation risen from the ashes. They achieved this miracle by placing trust in themselves. [This] is what Jews can do when they place trust in themselves, instead of in their enemies."

Asking Jews to find a solution to Arab aggression "is like blaming them for the aggression against them. Where is our sense of outrage? How dare Arabs blame Jews for their problems when they brought on their own problems?...It is extraordinary that we are in the position to have Arabs dictate what we should do in Jerusalem."

Anti-Semitism, said Wisse, is the "organization of politics" around the presence of Jews, and it is a very powerful political force. "Anti-Semitism projects an image of Jews that has nothing to do with reality. Jews' lack of political authority and their small size make them a no-fail enemy. Hatred of Jews on university campuses is rising because of the Arab hatred of Jews. We can see subtle forms of anti-Israel sentiments on these campuses. When a liberal is faced with irrational hatred, he has to make a choice between remaining a liberal and defending a Jew. To a liberal, everything is good but if he thinks this way, than he is holding Jews responsible for the aggression against them."

The perfect manifestation of this, said Wisse, is when "Leah Rabin embraced Yasser Arafat in her home [after her husband's death]. She does not hate him yet she would not shake hands with Benjamin Netanyahu. By making friends with an enemy, we are making fellow Jews responsible for the hatred against them."

The question for Israel "is how to fend off war. The only way things will change is when the Arabs change. If Israel is willing to give back land, there is always someone to take it...Eventually one has to hold on."

Eitz Chaim takes part in space research project

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Space research has come to a Toronto day school.

Canola seeds taken on board the June 1996 flight of the space shuttle Columbia by Canadian astronaut Robert Thirsk have been distributed to elementary schools around the country willing to conduct an experiment to compare the growth of seeds that travelled in space with that of seeds that stayed on earth. The cross-Canada project is called Canolab.

Sandy Crone's Grade six class at Eitz Chaim Schools Spring Farm Campus took up the challenge. Encouraged by school vice-principal and science co-ordinator Anita Wein, the girls helped build special equipment to grow the seeds indoors, including a watering system and adjustable lighting.

The girls spoke to The CJN with enthusiasm, showing their plants and scientific journals and discussing their methodology and findings.

The seeds that had flown in space sprouted first, but those that had remained on earth quickly caught up and surpassed them, the students discovered. Theories offered included radiation, gases in space and the weightless conditions in the space shuttle.

The results will be sent to NASA, and will be collated with results from other school experiments with the canola seeds.

One student explained that "in a few years, we might have to live on [different] planets, if the earth gets too polluted. We have to know if, for instance, gravity affects growing plants."

While most of the students thought that living and working in space would be "cool", they recognized potential problems, such as building a totally new economy, and creating new infrastructure such as hospitals and buildings.

"I would like to try it out first," one girl confided.

"It would be a whole new life," noted another, and "we are not ready yet. We have to start learning."

Another student felt that we really don't need to worry — that by the time we are ready to live in space or on space ships we will have worked out those problems.

The consideration that "it's hard to be a Jew" surfaced during the conversation, with one student wondering how we would keep Shabbat.

Wein explained that the Canadian Space Agency sent full instructions to those participating in the project. The object of the exercise was to encourage the development of research skills, as well as to wet the students' interest in science.

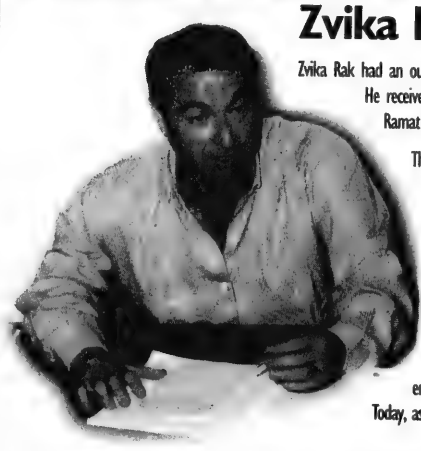
Zvika Rak. The Right Attitude



Zvika Rak had an outstanding military career. During the Six Day War he fought in the Sinai, El Arish and the Suez Canal. He received a medal during the Yom Kippur War and in 1972 was the Commander of the tank division in the Ramat H'golan area.

Then his life changed. He was seriously injured, his right arm severed from his body, his left arm completely mangled. 'When I look back, I think of how lucky I was. The rehabilitation and assistance from the Beit Halochem Centre in Haifa gave me the courage to feel strong and self-confident, not that the path to recovery was easy.'

Zvika then entered university to study public relations. When he graduated, he began Military College in Haifa., and was appointed Head of the Haifa Army District. Currently he is the chief auditor of Haifa.

'Today, as a family, we travel extensively, in and out of Israel. I have been able to shrug off any embarrassment swimming without my arm. Each person goes through rehabilitation in their own way. Today, as a Beit Halochem member, I help younger disabled soldiers.'

Former skinhead now helps fight racism

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — From skinhead street brawler to anti-racism advocate, Tom Leyden has turned his life around 180 degrees. But he's had to pay a steep price to do it.

In the two years since he began to distance himself from the racist movement, his wife left him, he sees his two children only six days a month, he lost almost all his (racist) friends and he's received death threats from his former ideological soul mates.

Despite all that, Leyden, 30, wouldn't have it any other way. He has no regrets about leaving the militant skinhead movement where he was an active member for half his life.

Leyden was in Toronto last week to tell his story at the Beth Tzedec Synagogue at a lecture sponsored by the Simon Wiesenthal Centre (SWC). Leyden has been associated with the Los Angeles-based head office of the SWC for the past year or so and he credits the organization with helping him make the transition from an advocate of racial separation to a speaker on behalf of racial cooperation.

In an interview prior to his speaking engagement, Leyden described his years in the movement and its links to Canadian racists. He offered surprising revelations about the close cooperation between white supremacists and the Nation of Islam (NOI), the black pride organization headed by Louis Farrakhan.

Back in the days when he was in the U.S. military, he developed a working relationship with NOI marines at a base in Hawaii. The two sides colluded to foment racist violence, as part of a long term goal to make life between the races so uncomfortable they would opt for racial separation, Leyden said.

During the three years he was a marine, Leyden would write anti-white racist slogans on bathroom walls in bars frequented by GIs. The NOI would do the same with anti-Black slogans. Ordinary soldiers would see the graffiti and hold their fellow marines responsible. After a few drinks, brawls would often break out and the racists would fight alongside the whites in the hope of eventually winning them over to their ideology, he said.

After leaving the military, he employed the same tactic in high schools, Leyden said.

Contrary to perceptions that skinheads and the NOI could be mortal enemies, they share the belief that the enemy of my enemy is my friend and both sides see Jews as their enemy.

"The NOI sees Jews as a gutter white religion and the white racists don't see them as white at all," he said.

When he entered the skinhead movement as a teenager, Leyden didn't harbor any particular racist views that he had picked up at home. In fact, "my mom didn't tolerate racism at all."

But he was full of anger and frustration at the divorce of his parents, and so he turned to the punk music movement to vent his rage. It was the early '80s and he joined other teens in mosh pits where young people would slam dance to the sounds of racist bands like Screwdriver and Brutal Attack.

Even today, racist bands are a potent inducement to entice angry young people to a racist ideology, he said, pointing to Resistance Records, run by Canadian white supremacist George Burdi, as a major label on the scene. (Burdi is in jail for assault.)

Back then, most of his friends enjoyed the same music and they absorbed its message together. "We all became Nazis and skinheads together. We were all friends, listened to the same music and became a kind of family," he said.

Getting support from his gang/community, Leyden and his friends would go out looking for trouble. Ninety percent of their victims were whites, he said: guys with ponytails who were seen as drug addicts; preppies who were seen as "fags." Labelling them in that way was usually enough to bring on a beating, or "a boot party," as skinheads called it.

"We were like the outcasts fighting the in-crowd," he said.

On one occasion, he and others beat someone so badly they broke his ribs, nose and jaw and separated his shoulder.

The victim, fearing further retaliation, didn't press charges but over the years, Leyden accumulated five disorderly conduct convictions and one for possessing a concealed weapon. Along the way, he also managed to keep tattoo parlors in business, covering his body with 30 tattoos. Twenty-nine are racist in nature and three feature swastikas. Despite a long sleeve turtleneck, tattoos are visible on his neck and on his hand.

Leyden's violent phase slowed down when he got married, but not his racist attitudes. His wife, whom he married after knowing her for two weeks, held the same belief system and they brought up their children as racists.

Ironically, fatherhood was one of the factors that pushed Leyden away from the skinhead movement. On one occasion when he and his three-year-old son were watching cartoons, the boy shut off the set, saying, "Daddy, you know you're not supposed to watch anything with niggers."

Even at that tender age, his son gave the Nazi salute to any flag and hated the government. "He was a much bigger racist at three than I was at 28," Leyden said.

An incident at the Aryan Nations (AN) compound in Idaho further cemented his resolve to leave the movement. When he asked an AN member what the world would be like if it magically became all-white, "the guy said, 'TJ, we're starting on hair color next.' Sooner or later, it'll be everybody next," Leyden said.

With visions of his son living a dead-end lifestyle as a teenage skinhead, Leyden tried to move away from the movement. His wife, however, would not abandon those beliefs. After he snatched his children and went through court cases, a divorce court awarded her custody, knowing her racist views. The judge even said she could take the boys to Ku Klux Klan rallies as long as they were probably supervised, Leyden said.

When he left the movement, his mother suggested he contact the SWC to tell his story. He did so over the course of two weeks and later, unexpectedly, was invited to meet organization officials. They asked him to speak out against hate and "since July, I've been talking my head off."

He's addressed people at the Pentagon, members of the Alcohol Tobacco and Firearms bureau, the FBI, local law enforcement agencies and students. He warns young people about racist recruitment and for those already caught up in the skinhead movement, he tells them to get out "because eventually every skinhead I know ended up in jail, dead or paralyzed."

Leyden is not optimistic about the future. The Order is becoming even more extreme, believing violence will lead to racial war, and skinheads who broke away from old-line racist groups three years ago are also becoming more radical.

University student group prepares for conference

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Less than a year after its inception, Kol Hastudentim is preparing for a major leadership conference.

The group, an Ontario-wide independent council of Jewish university students, was organized last summer following the cessation of activity by Network Canada, precipitated by a withdrawal of its funding by the Council of Jewish Federations Canada.

For the record, Kol Hastudentim, with representatives from 19 campuses, is not a resurrected Network, stressed Jason Young, the group's chair, in a recent interview.

"Network was Canada; we're Ontario. Network was politically motivated; Kol is not. Our focus is completely Jewish development and leadership development," he said. In fact, former Networkers constitute less than one-quarter of Kol's council membership, noted the University of Toronto biomedical engineering student.

Like Network, however, Kol takes a firm stand on being student-run. As a past president (1995-96) of the Jewish Students' Union at the University of Western Ontario who attributes his involvement to "good role models," Young believes that student leaders can bond with and inspire other student leaders in a way that paid professionals can't.

Not that he's against campus professionals, a number of whom will speak at the upcoming conference. Unlike his Network predecessors, Young said Kol Hastudentim is "working very hard to work with the community. We're working toward the same goals."

"If anything, they're strengthening what the established Jewish community has set out," confirmed Jennifer Turack, director of community services and youth activities for Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region. "The connection between the smaller campuses is much stronger now, because they have a personal connection."

Like Network — actually, like just about any organization these days — Kol has faced an ongoing struggle to obtain funding. Donations from individual and corporate donors have brought them close to their annual budgetary needs of $15,000. Kol is on its way to becoming a charitable organization, said Young, and can issue tax receipts.

Over the past academic year, Kol Hastudentim activities have included trips to Boston and Washington, D.C., a ski trip, a Shabbaton at the University of Guelph and a Purim party at the University of Western Ontario.

The latter event, for which students were bussed in from McMaster and Waterloo, benefitted "all the [Highway] 401 schools" within driving distance of London, said Young.

Aside from regional Kol Hastudentim events, the only opportunity for Ontario students to come together is the annual Council of University Presidents (CUP) conference run by Canadian Jewish Congress, said Young. There has never actually been a "CUP," however, although the executive of Kol is made up of presidents of Jewish student organizations.

Last summer, student leaders meeting in Toronto decided that Kol Hastudentim would focus on developing student leadership, strengthening the individual campus groups and serving as a link between Ontario campuses.

The upcoming conference, called the MEGA-Leadership Conference '97, will be held May 15 to 18 at Maple Lake Resort. The fee for those who have not yet registered is $125. Speakers will include student leaders and campus professionals as well as CJN columnist Elliott Malamet of the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto. Ralph Benmergui of CBC Newsworld will be a special guest.

Topics to be addressed include Intro to Leadership Styles, Engaging Students on Campus, and Time Management and Listening Skills. Elections will be held and students will plan for the coming year.

"We don't deal with only-big or only-small campus issues, because that would isolate people," said Young.

For further information about the upcoming conference or Kol Hastudentim, contact Young by phone at 905-731-6349, by e-mail at [jyoung@ibme.utoronto.ca], write Kol Hastudentim, 45 Prince Edward Blvd., Thornhill, Ontario L3T 7G1, or contact your local campus representative.

Western JSU launches petition

LONDON, Ont. — Members of the Jewish Students' Union (JSU) at the University of Western Ontario have launched a petition calling for action by the Canadian government in prosecuting known Nazi war criminals living in this country.

They are asking students from universities across Ontario to sign their student numbers, as opposed to their names.

The use of student numbers sends a message that the government's inactivity diminishes the memory of those who perished in Nazi concentration camps after being reduced to the numbers tattooed on their arms.

The petition was the brainchild of two JSU members, Amanda Blitz and Evan Propst.

Spurred on by a stream of reports about the difficulties of the Justice Ministry in seeking out and prosecuting Nazi war criminals, Blitz and Propst launched this petition as an integral part of the JSU's day-long vigil, Unto Every Person There is a Name.

Gabriel Meranda, director of the JSU at Western, says that this petition will provide university students with an opportunity to make a clear and poignant statement to the Canadian government about this very serious and pressing issue.

The petition has already made its way to a number of Ontario universities, and plans have been made to collate all student numbers gathered at the Kol Hastudentim Mega-Leadership conference in May.

לנתק את שויץ מהמפה שלנו:

משא כבד ירד מעל תושבי ישראל כאשר סוף סוף נחתם הסכם על פינוי חברון, וכך הוסר האיום שאמריקה תסגור את הברז. ובינתיים העיתונאים והאנשים היפים אשר יושבים בשנקין על כוס קפה ועוגה ומשלמים עבור התענוג סכום שהיה מביא מיתון על משפחות מתנחלים בחברון, שכחו שאבותיהם המציאו את הציונות בגלל מערת המכפלה, יריחו, בית אל, ירושלים השלמה ועוד גבעות קדושות. ההבדל בין טרומפלדור והבילויים למתנחלי השטחים הוא שבימים ההם טלביזיה עדיין לא היתה בחיתולים וגייסות עיתונאים, צלמים, ועוד פונקציונרים אמיצים התפרנסו מעיסוקים אמיתיים. כך שישובים כמו ראש פינה, יסוד המעלה, פתח תקווה ואפילו תל-אביב יכלו לקום חדשות לבקרים. למזלם הרע של המתנחלים החדשים, מצלמות הטלביזיה וצבא השדרנים שינו סדרי בראשית וכך הפכו הם מחלוצים אמיצים ומקריבים לאויבי דמוקרטיה פאטיים, מכובשי שממה תמימים למסכלי שלום מופרעים. וכשחלוקת ירושלים תעמוד על הפרק שוב נכנע לאיום סגירת הברז, ואחרי שירושלים תחולק ומדינה פלשתינאית תיוולד, יבקשו ערביי הגליל והמשולש אוטונומיה, ושוב יהיה קשה לעמוד בלחץ. ואז יגיע התור של עכו, צפת, יפו וחיפה. אחרי הכל מה זה כמה אלפים של היסטוריה לעומת החיים הטובים והזדמנות להיות אור לגויים.

נכון שהייתם בניאגרה כבר עשר פעמים? ונכון שנדרתם נדר שהאורחים הבאים שיגיעו מישראל ייסעו לשם לבד או בטיול מאורגן? ונכון שאיך שיופיעו האורחים הבאים בקיץ תיסעו לשם שוב? טוב, אז אם אנחנו על בסיס משותף עד כאן, יש לי בשבילכם הודעה מרגינה: פתחו בניאגרה מצפה פרפרים מרהיב עין: בתוך בועה גדולה מסתובבים חופשי אלפי פרפרים יפיפים, אוכלים, שותים, מתרבים, וחכל לנגד עיניהם הנדהמות של אלפי מבקרים. וזהו אחד האתרים הראשונים מסוגו בצפון אמריקה. (בניאגרה אומרים שהוא הראשון, אלא שהייתי לפני חודש בסאן דיאגו וגם שם יש דבר כזה ואמרו שהוא הכי ראשון). שווה ביקור, ויעשה לכם את ניאגרה יותר מעניינת. המצפה אינו נמצא ליד המפלים, וכדאי לשאול בבודקה הראשונה שרואים לתיירים.

Eco-Zionism conference a unique experience

By SAMANTHA BERMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — In March, I spent a weekend at the eco-Zionism conference in Marin County, Calif.

When I heard about it last year from a friend who went to the eco-Zionism conference in Arizona, I was a little dubious — I had barely even considered the possibility of a connection between environmentalism and Judaism.

Comment

But while attending a Tu b'Shvat seder organized by the Jewish Student Federation and the JNF on Campus group at York University, I heard about it again and changed my mind. In retrospect, I realize that being a part of the 1997 conference has been a life-changing experience.

Sponsored by the JNF on Campus in the United States, the eco-Zionism conference offers Jewish university students from all over North America a chance to discuss their connections to the earth from a Jewish perspective. With a view of the ocean and surrounded by mountains, we spent the weekend praying, dancing, singing Jewish niggunim, sharing old Jewish tales, hiking in Northern California, studying Torah and star-gazing.

The only two labels that I have ever identified with (actually, insisted on) are that I'm a Jew and an environmentalist. Never did it cross my mind that these two beliefs could have a symbiotic relationship. Yet that weekend, sitting with Jewish environmental educators and studying Torah, I learned that Judaism has strong ties to the land and a deep regard for its continuity.

What I remember from my previous Jewish education was that humans were put on this earth to have dominion over all other beings (Genesis, 1:128). In other words, nature was given to humans simply for their advantage.

This new understanding made me realize that Judaism and environmentalism are not mutually exclusive and enabled me to fuse my two selves into one whole spiritually fulfilled and environmentally conscious person.

Even more gratifying was the new inclusion of G-d in my appreciation and connection with the environment. When camping or hiking, I often wander off alone to commune with nature. But recognizing the presence of a Divine Creator as responsible for all this beauty and opening up my eyes to see G-d in each of nature's gifts, literally brought me to tears.

Later at a Jewish liturgy workshop, we were given a number of Hebrew blessings to say during different experiences with nature, equipping me with a Jewish way to say thanks to G-d. And participating in Minchah on the beach, raising our voices over the roar of the ocean while breathing in the fresh sea air was one of the most meaningful experiences I have ever had.

Most importantly, the weekend in California helped me recover the sense of Zionism I had lost while living in Israel two years ago. Seeing how industrialized and populated Israel had become, I felt that I was not especially needed there. Yet, after thinking about what eco-Zionism meant to me, I finally was able to reconcile modern day Israel and Zionism from an ecological point of view. Before we turn the Land of Milk and Honey into the Land of Concrete paved over by highways, with hotels and other buildings, eco-Zionism encourages us to reclaim Israel from this industrialization.

In an age of advanced modern technology, there are ways to develop without causing environmental destruction — we just need the will.

As an eco-Zionist, I can envision a promising future for Israel and be assured of leaving a beautiful and thriving homeland for our children.

Somehow, we never get tired of poultry. Even on Pesach there are many appetizing ways of making it.

BASQUE STYLE CHICKEN

1½ lb. chicken pieces — thighs, drumsticks or breast — or cut-up chicken
1 to 2 tbsp. olive oil
Salt and pepper
½ cup chicken broth
¼ cup dry kosher wine
½ tsp. crushed chili peppers
2 (or more) cloves garlic, sliced
1 cup sliced mushrooms
1 red pepper (or mixture red and green) seeded and cut into strips
½ cup green and black olives, halved
Chopped parsley

In large skillet, on medium-high heat, brown chicken in hot oil on all sides until golden. Remove chicken; season with salt and pepper. Drain fat from skillet; add chicken broth, wine, chili peppers and garlic, stir to loosen any pieces stuck to pan. Return chicken to skillet; cover and cook, turning chicken occasionally, 30 to 35 minutes until tender.

Remove cover, add mushrooms, pepper strips and olives. Stir and cook until vegetables are heated through and tender-crisp, about five minutes. Serve immediately, garnished with chopped parsley. Serves 4.

GLAZED CHICKEN

2 cut up chickens
1 pkg. onion soup mix
1 small jar apricot jam
⅔ cup ketchup

Combine onion soup mix, jam and ketchup. Pour over chicken. Bake at 300 degrees, covered, for 45 minutes. Uncover and bake for additional 30 minutes, basting to prevent drying out. Serves 8.

AROMATIC CHICKEN

3½ lbs. cut-up chicken
1 tbsp. oil
Salt, pepper, paprika
Lemon juice
Thyme
2 heads garlic, cloves peeled
20 shallots, peeled
6 small boiling onions
½ lb. mushrooms, quartered
2 doz. small red potatoes, unpeeled
½ cup dry red or white kosher wine

Rub chicken parts with mixture of oil, lemon juice and seasonings. Place in large roasting pan with remaining ingredients. Roast in 350-degree oven about one hour or until chicken and vegetables are brown. Serves 4 to 6.

APRICOT CHICKEN

3 cups dried apricots
3¾ cups water
9 tbsp. matzo meal
6 chicken quarters
Salt to taste
Pepper to taste

Soak the apricots in the water overnight. Drain the apricots and reserve the water.

Mix the matzah meal, salt and pepper. Coat the chicken pieces. Heat the oil and brown the chicken on all sides. Remove chicken from the pan. Add any remaining flour to the pan and cook for one minute. Stir in the reserved water and bring to a boil. Return the chicken pieces to the pan and add the apricots. Cover and simmer. Serves 6.

And for something really special:

POULTRY PAPRIKASH
(Foodland Ontario)

1 tbsp. pareve margarine
1 tbsp. Passover vegetable oil
1 onion, chopped
1 clove garlic, chopped
Cake meal
2 to 3 lb. cut Cornish hens in serving pieces or small chickens
1 large tomato, peeled, seeded and chopped
1 sweet pepper (red, green or yellow), cut in strips
½ lb. mushrooms, halved
1 tbsp. paprika (sweet or hot)
1 tsp. salt
½ cup tomato juice

In heavy frying pan, melt margarine with oil. Add onion and garlic; cook, covered, over low heat about 10 minutes or until onion is softened but not browned. Remove with slotted spoon; set aside.

Lightly dust hens

Increase heat to medium-high. Lightly dust hens with meal, add to pan and brown evenly, about 5 minutes on each side. Remove hens, set aside. Drain off excess fat. Add tomato, sweet pepper, mushrooms, reserved onion mixture, paprika and salt. Stir-fry 1 to 2 minutes. Add tomato juice and bring to boil, stirring well. Snuggle poultry pieces into sauce. Simmer, covered, 1¼ hour or until hens are cooked through and fork-tender, turning pieces once or twice during cooking.

Remove poultry and vegetables to platter and keep warm. Reduce liquid in pan over high heat until thickened, about 5 minutes. Spoon over hens. Serves 4.

Passover Foods

It's time to stop Passover egg-stravaganza

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

It is with equal parts delight and dread that I anticipate Pesach. Delight comes from being with family and friends for two food-filled seders and dread from having to clean my house from top to bottom.

Did I forget to mention that I also have to peel dozens of eggs, no matter how many people are actually coming for the seder? For some reason I always seem to worry there won't be enough.

Eggs are the one thing, besides matzah, on which we tend to go overboard during Pesach. There are conflicting reports as to how many eggs a week are good for you, but during Passover we all tend to consume too many. Because of their leavening ability we throw them in everything from breakfast to dessert. I say stop the egg-stravagance.

The following recipes don't contain eggs. You can use them during the week or as side dishes and desserts for the seder or Shabbat meals.

AVOCADO AND GRAPEFRUIT SALAD WITH HONEY DRESSING

4 large grapefruits, peeled and segmented
4 large avocados, peeled and sliced
1 small red onion, sliced thin
½ head iceberg lettuce, shredded
½ head red leaf lettuce, shredded
¼ cup sunflower seeds
Dressing:
1 cup Passover vinegar
½ cup kosher wine
½ cup sugar
6 tsp. honey

Place all dressing ingredients in food processor or jar. Blend well and set aside. For salad: combine lettuce in large salad bowl. Add grapefruit, avocado, and onion. Toss gently. Pour desired amount of dressing on top of salad and toss. Sprinkle sunflower seeds over the top of salad. Serves 10 to 12.

LYONNAISE HOT POTATO SALAD

3 tbsp. Passover oil
2 tbsp. chicken broth
2 tbsp. dry white wine
1 tbsp. lemon juice
1 tbsp. Passover vinegar
¼ tsp. salt
black pepper
potatoes, peeled and sliced
2 tsp. green onions chopped
1 tbsp. fresh parsley, chopped

Cover potatoes with water and cook in a large sauce pan until tender (15 to 20 minutes) then drain. Place in large bowl. While potatoes are cooking, combine green onions and parsley and set aside. Place remaining ingredients in sauce pan and bring to boil. Remove dressing from heat and pour over potatoes. Toss gently. Sprinkle with green onions and parsley. Serves 8 to 10.

BAKING MATZAH I

Boxing freshly-baked matzah at a matzah factory in Jerusalem, 1978.

Egg-stravaganza ends here

LACE COOKIES

½ cup sugar
1½ tsp. potato starch
2 tbsp. milk
¼ cup finely chopped almonds
1 stick unsalted butter cake meal
butter

Combine sugar and potato starch in a sauce pan. Stir in milk. Add remaining ingredients and bring to boil over medium heat. Stir constantly. Cook for approximately 1 minute at a boil and then remove from heat. Refrigerate for 1 hour. Preheat oven to 350. Cover 2 cookie sheets with foil, grease and sprinkle cake meal. Drop dough by teaspoon onto cookie sheets, making sure cookies are at least 3 inches apart. Bake 6 to 7 minutes. Let cool, remove foil from cookie sheet and gently remove cookies. Makes 15 to 18 cookies.

CHOCOLATE MARSHMALLOW SURPRISE

¼ cup butter
3½ cups Passover marshmallows
1 cup chopped nuts
5 cups matzah farfel
1 cup raisins
½ tsp. cinnamon
6 oz. semi sweet chocolate

Grease a 9x13 pan and set aside. In a saucepan, melt butter over low heat. Stir in marshmallows until just melted. Remove from heat. Add half chopped nuts to melted marshmallows. Stir. Add farfel, raisins and cinnamon to marshmallow nut mixture. When everything is combined, spread mixture evenly into greased pan. Wet hands when patting it down to help spread evenly. Sprinkle remaining nuts on top. Press into mixture to set. Refrigerate 15 or 20 minutes until chocolate has set. Cut into squares.

CREAM OF CANTALOUPE SOUP

2 cups cantaloupes cut into small pieces
1 cup orange juice
½ cup lemon juice
½ tsp. cinnamon
½ cup heavy cream
2 tbsp. honey
16 oz. lemon, peach, or vanilla yogurt
Fresh sliced strawberries

In a food processor or blender, blend cantaloupe for 10 to 15 seconds. Add orange juice, lemon juice, and cinnamon. Process for additional 10 seconds. Add cream and honey. Scrape down sides and process additional 10 seconds. Pour cantaloupe mixture into bowl and fold in yogurt. Refrigerate for several hours. To serve, place in bowl and garnish with fresh strawberries. Serves 6 to 8.

PASSOVER BRISKET WITH SPINACH AND CARROT STUFFING

4 lb. brisket
2 tbsp. oil
2 tsp. minced garlic
6 green onions chopped
1¾ lbs. fresh spinach, washed and stemmed
1 cup matzah farfel
1 tsp. salt
¼ cup oil
¾ tsp. ground pepper
6 medium carrots, peeled, 4 in ½ rounds, 2 sliced thin, lengthwise
2 large onions, sliced
¾ cup dry kosher wine
¾ cup beef or chicken stock

Have butcher cut a pocket horizontally along one side of brisket, leaving a ½ inch border around three sides.

In large saucepan, heat oil. Add garlic and cook over moderate heat for 30 seconds, stirring constantly. Add green onions and cook 2 minutes longer. Transfer onion and garlic to a large bowl.

Add spinach into saucepan and cook until barely wilted and still bright green (about 2 minutes). Set aside to cool slightly, then squeeze dry. Chop spinach coarsely and squeeze out remaining liquid. Place spinach in bowl with green onions and garlic. Stir in oil, farfel, salt and pepper.

Place 4 yards of kitchen string in a small bowl of water to soak. Place half of the thin sliced carrots in brisket pocker in a layer going against the grain of the meat. Spread spinach stuffing on top of carrots and arrange remaining thin carro: slices on top of stuffing.

Using kitchen string, tie brisket at one-inch intervals to secure stuffing. Scatter sliced onions and remaining carrot rounds over bottom of pan. Place brisket on top of vegetables. Season brisket with salt and pepper. Cook uncovered for 15 minutes at 425 in a preheated oven.

Pour wine and stock into roasting pan and cover tightly with foil. Reduce oven to 325 and cook until meat is fork tender (3½ to 5 hours). Remove from oven, loosen foil, and let brisket rest for 30 minutes.

Meanwhile, strain liquid from pan, remove any fat and strain again. If less than ¾ cup of liquid, add stock or water. Place carrots and onions in food processer, add liquid and purée. Reheat in a small pan. Season to taste. Slice in thick slices against the grain and serve with sauce on the side. This can be made ahead of time and reheated just before serving. Serves 10 to 12.

BAKING MATZAH II

Scrumptuous soups a feel good food

Soups don't have to exhaust you before you have something scrumptuous — real feel good food.

Try these from Foodland Ontario — tasty, healthy, and attractive — what more do you want?

WINTER VEGETABLE SOUP

1 onion, chopped
2 carrots, peeled and diced
2 beets, peeled and diced
2 cloves garlic, minced
5 cups vegetable or chicken broth
3 medium parsnips, peeled and sliced
3 cups chopped green cabbage
½ tsp. dried Passover marjoram leaves
½ tsp. dried Passover thyme leaves
Salt and pepper
2 tbsp. chopped fresh parsley

In large saucepan, combine onion, carrots, beets, garlic and broth. Cover and bring to a boil; reduce heat and simmer, covered, 10 minutes.

Add parsnips, cabbage, marjoram and thyme; cook until vegetables are tender, about 15 minutes. Season to taste with salt and pepper. Garnish with parsley. Makes 8 cups

QUICK AND COLORFUL VEGETABLE SOUP

In medium saucepan, combine 1 chopped onion, 2 diced carrots, 1 medium peeled and diced potato and 4 cups chicken broth. Bring to a boil; reduce heat and simmer, covered, until vegetables are almost tender, about 10 minutes. Stir in 1½ cups each small broccoli and cauliflower florets, ¾ tsp. dried Passover thyme or oregano leaves and a pinch of pepper. Return to a boil and cook until broccoli and cauliflower are tender, about 5 minutes. Sprinkle each serving with chopped fresh parsley. Serves 4.

ONTARIO VEGETABLE BORSCHT

3 medium unpeeled beets
⅓ cup pareve Passover margarine
1½ cups coarsely chopped onions
1 can (28 oz.) tomatoes
4 cups beef stock
5 medium potatoes, peeled
1 tsp. caraway seeds
1 cup coarsely diced carrots
1 cup coarsely diced rutabaga
1 tsp. salt
3 cups finely sliced green cabbage
2 cups finely sliced red cabbage
2 tsp. dried dillweed
pepper

Keeping roots and stems intact, rinse beets thoroughly; set aside.

In Dutch oven, melt half the margarine over medium heat; cook onions until softened. Add tomatoes (breaking up with fork), stock, beets, 4 of the potatoes and caraway seeds; bring to boil. Reduce heat, cover and simmer until potatoes are tender, about 30 minutes. Remove potatoes to bowl; mash until smooth and set aside. Cook vegetables 15 to 20 minutes longer or until beets are tender. Remove beets; slip off skins under cold running water. Grate into bowl; set aside.

Stir mashed potatoes into pan. Cut remaining potato into large dice; add to pan along with carrots, rutabaga, grated beets and salt. Cover and simmer until vegetables are cooked through, 8 to 10 minutes.

Meanwhile, melt remaining margarine over medium heat; cook green cabbage until brightened. Add to soup and cook, uncovered, 3 minutes. Add red cabbage and dillweed; cook 3 minutes or just until cabbage is tendercrisp. Taste and add more salt if desired and pepper. Serves 12.

Low cholesterol eating a holiday challenge

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Healthy low cholesterol eating can be especially challenging at Passover, says Sharon Gottlieb, a registered dietitian nutritionist in private practice at The Fitness Institute.

Gottlieb, who counsels individuals and groups on adjusting diets to live a healthier lifestyle says, "At Passover, the tendency is to rely on an abundance of eggs and animal protein foods." To help her clients, she has prepared some information and tips for those who must control their cholesterol.

There are many misconceptions about cholesterol and managing cholesterol, she says, and people can improve their heart health by becoming better informed about what they can do to reduce their cholesterol levels.

The body's production of cholesterol is influenced by genetic and dietary factors. There are two serum cholesterols. A "good" cholesterol, HDL (high density lipoprotein) gathers up the excess cholesterol in the bloodstream and carries it back to the liver to be excreted by the body.

The LDL (low density lipoprotein) is the "bad" cholesterol because this is the one that can build up in the artery wall. Dietary cholesterol is found in foods of animal origin such as meat, dairy products, egg yolks, poultry, and organ meats. "Dietary cholesterol can affect serum cholesterol in some people but the amount and type of fat consumed is far more significant."

An elevated level of serum cholesterol is associated with an increased risk of coronary artery disease. Clogged arteries increase the risk of heart attack. Other risk factors include smoking, obesity, sedentary lifestyle, diabetes and stress, she says.

Gottlieb advises a reduction in the intake of total fat to less than 30 per cent of calories.

"Use a non-hydrogenated soft tub margarine instead of butter, increase your intake of soluble fibre, aim at two or three fish meals a week, keep meat portions to a 3-ounce serving size, limit your intake of processed food, and limit your intake of egg yolks by substituting two egg whites for a whole egg."

Gottlieb says consumers should become knowledgeable about substituting healthy ingredients for higher cholesterol and higher fat products.

Simply Egg Whites, she says, is a new fresh egg product that has no additives or preservatives and can be used in many recipes calling for whole eggs.

Produced in Vancouver and distributed by Disley's Egg Distributors, Simply Egg Whites is under kashruth supervision and designated dairy throughout the year, but produced pareve for Passover.

PASSOVER MUSHROOM FARFEL KUGEL

16 oz matzah farfel
4 cups defatted chicken broth
1 Spanish onion, chopped
½ lb mushrooms, sliced
½ green pepper, chopped
1 carrot, grated
½ cup Simply Egg Whites beaten salt, black pepper, garlic powder to taste vegetable oil cooking spray

In a large mixing bowl, combine matzah farfel and heated chicken stock. Set aside.

On medium high heat, sauté onion in a large skillet sprayed with Passover cooking spray and a little water. Add green peppers, carrot and mushrooms and continue to sauté vegetables until softened.

Combine vegetables with matzah farfel mixture. Add beaten egg whites, salt, pepper, and Passover garlic powder to taste. Turn mixture into a 9 x 12 casserole sprayed with Passover cooking spray. Bake at 350 for one hour or until golden brown. Serves 16.

Symbolic foods a Pesach staple

In springtime each year, Jewish families and friends in Toronto and around the globe observe the Passover holiday.

The central service revolves around the Passover seder, which is replete with symbolic foods and drink. Salt water is served to recall the tears of slavery. Bitter herbs are eaten to identify with the plight of the ancient Hebrew slaves. And red wine is used because it symbolizes the shedding of innocent blood during those years of bondage, and because it is considered the most festive kind of wine.

The family assembles around the seder table for the first two evenings of Passover. The table is set with the finest tableware, cuisine and quality wine. This festive yet solemn dinner begins with the drinking of the first of four glasses of red wine. The second goblet is consumed prior to the meal, the third glass immediately after grace is recited and the fourth and final glass is sipped after chanting the Psalms. A fifth goblet of wine, which is not consumed, is poured for the prophet: Elijah.

It is also customary to eat a mixture of nuts, apples and red wine, known as "charoset," which is prepared in a manner that resembles mortar. The symbolism is not lost on the participants, who discuss the manner in which the Hebrew slaves used mortar to construct pharaoh's cities. To prepare charoset; mix peeled and chopped apples with chopped walnuts and cinnamon – and whatever else your family traditionally uses. Add Kedem Cream Red Concord, suggests Jack Tewel of Mazel Wines, (available at the LCBO, ask for CSPC #206953), and stir until it looks like mortar.

Tewel recommends the following kosher for Passover wines:

Baron Edmund Benjamin de Rothschild Haute-Medoc 1993. Richly textured and silky smooth red wine, from France.

2. Herzog Selection, Beaujolais Villages 1995. Bright red wine made from Gamay Noir grapes, from France.

3. Baron Herzog Wine Cellars, Zinfandel 1993. This rare kosher red zinfandel is bursting with flavors of blackberries, raspberries and plums. From California.

4. Baron Herzog Wine Cellars, Gamay 1995. This award winning red is aromatic with tones of cotton candy, spice and berries.

5. Weinstock Cellars, Cabernet Sauvignon 1993. This California Cabernet was chosen an all-star and best buy in the prestigious Wine Spectator magazine. This medium bodied red wine abounds with cherry flavors and herbaceous aromas. Aged in oak barrels.

6. Baron Herzog Wine Cellars, Chenin Blanc 1995). For those who must have a white wine, this wine was voted "The Best Of The Year" in the January 1997 issue of Bon Appetit magazine. It was described as "Peachy and fresh with spice and lingering flavors."

Potato soufflé a sweet dish

Every holiday, the Kosher Information Service of the Kashruth Council of Toronto offers special yom tov recipes. Pesach is no exception.

A press release from the Kosher Information Service notes that "the preparations, the special foods and the gathering of family and friends make this a memorable time — a time to discuss past and present. A time to express our gratitude for the blessings in life."

ZUCCHINI AND PEPPER (Salad)
Or use your favorite vegetables

2 zucchini, skin on, sliced
2 red peppers, cut into strips
2 red onions, thinly sliced
½ cup sour cream or yogurt
Salt and pepper to taste
Sprigs of flat-leafed parsley

Place vegetables in a salad bowl. Before serving, drizzle with sour cream or yogurt. Add salt and pepper to taste. Toss and sprinkle with parsley. Yields 6-8 servings.

Notes: French dressing also goes well with this salad. Use English cucumber slices instead of zucchini.

SWEET POTATO SOUFFLÉ (Dairy)

6 medium sweet potatoes
½ cup milk
2 tbsp. butter or margarine
½ tsp. salt
½ tsp. grated orange peel
⅛ tsp. Passover cinnamon
2 egg yolks
2 egg whites

Cook potatoes in boiling salted water until tender. Drain, peel and mash. In a large mixing bowl, combine mashed potatoes with milk, butter, salt, orange peel and cinnamon. Beat until fluffy. Add egg yolks; beat well. Beat egg whites to stiff peaks; fold into potato mixture. Turn into ungreased 1-quart soufflé dish. Bake in preheated 350 F oven about 55-60 minutes. Top with lots of butter or margarine if desired. Serves 6.

PEACH TRIFLE (Dairy)

2 packages instant vanilla or chocolate pudding mix prepared according to package directions. Set aside.
1 sponge cake, cut in ¾-inch slices
Strawberry or raspberry jam
½ cup wine or orange juice
2 cups diced fresh fruit of your choice
Reserve some for garnish

Garnish: Toasted slivered almonds and fresh fruit.

Arrange ⅓ of the cake slices in bottom of a large trifle or glass bowl. Spread with jam and drizzle with ⅓ of the wine or orange juice. Cover with ⅓ of the pudding mixture. Top with half of the fresh fruit. Repeat layers ending with the pudding mixture. Cover and refrigerate overnight. Before serving, garnish with toasted slivered almonds and fresh fruit. Yield 10 to 12 servings.

Variation: Use jelly roll slices, omit the jam.

A real gefilte fish story

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Most people wouldn't dream of serving anything at the seder but home-made chicken soup, made from family recipes handed down from one generation to the next. But not so with gefilte fish. These days it's a rarity to get the real-McCoy homemade stuff. Few people have qualms about serving the store bought varieties from the caterer or the jar.

The sad truth is gefilte fish making, so bound with the lore of our past, is a dying art. There are many great gefilte fish stories. Who hasn't heard tales about carp swimming in bathtubs? Our bubbies certainly liked their fish fresh.

Lawyer Donald Carr who grew up in Leeds (England) recalls walking through the Jewish quarter at Pesach and hearing a tapping noise — the sound of fish being chopped in wooden bowls — emanating from every house in the neighborhood.

Our grandmothers and great grandmothers would chop and mince the fish by hand using a large single blade chopper with a large wooden bowl or pestle and mortar. They would painstakingly form the fish mixed with eggs and matzah meal into balls and patties, place them into huge pots and cook the fish in a stock made of fish heads and bones, carrots and other vegetables.

The Romanians, however would save the skin of the fish, stuff it and cook it whole, which is how the dish got its name: gefilte fish means stuffed fish. Julie Lewis who works for the Lotto Corp., remembers her late Romanian grandmother, Bianca Lefton, serving the gefilte fish whole in a pike skin — head intact — with parsley between the teeth of the fish, she says. "It looked like it was smiling." Lewis adds that her former boss, cooking maven Bonnie Stern, was so intrigued she actually came to watch Lefton make her fish.

In the old days you could track a person's origins by the type of gefilte fish they served. The Romanian whole fish and the English-style fried gefilte fish are dead give-a-ways. But more subtle is the differentiation between the peppery/ salty/ savory and the sweet-tasting balls or patties. They say Litvaks (Jews of Russian origin) made a saltier fish while the sweeter variety was linked to Jews from Poland.

With this generation abandoning the art of gefilte fish making many recipes, in families for generations, have been lost. But homemaker Bernice Mukamal, a former New Yorker whose mother grew up in England, did uphold the family tradition — British style — and has furnished The CJN with her mother's fried gefilte fish recipe.

Mukamal makes her fried gefilte fish recipe with seven or eight pounds of fish at one time at yontif because there is such a big demand for it from family and friends. She sends a hot batch to Donald Carr with a jar of home-made horseradish every holiday. He says her fish tastes as good as the gefilte fish his mother used to make back in Leeds.

Ingredients

1 lb. of ground fish — white fish, yellow pike, pickerel, and if available a small piece of pike or salmon trout
1 medium onion — hand-cut very fine
2 eggs
1 tbsp. matzah meal
¼ cup ice water
¾ tsp. salt
¾ tsp. white pepper

Mix the ingredients. Form into patties. Put one inch of oil in the frying pan. Let it heat up to high. Fry the patties until brown on one side. Flip them over and cook until

AN EASTERN EUROPEAN SEDER

An elaborate, lavish seder in a home in Eastern Europe as depicted by Arthur Szyk [RNS 1994]

A gefilte fish story

second side is brown. The oil might need to be changed after two or three sets of patties.

This is a refined version of John Katz's grandmother's (Bubbie Katz) gefilte fish recipe. It's sweet, but not too sweet, he says.

Ingredients

2½ lb. each carp and white fish
Have the fish boned and filleted and ask the fishmonger to save the bones, tail and head in a separate bag
2 cups of water
7 carrots sliced diagonally
4 onions
2 stocks of celery
10 cloves of garlic
2 cups of matzah meal
6 tsp. of salt
¼ cup sugar
3 eggs
1 tsp. pepper

In food processor, chop fish to a medium grind, making sure all the bones are out. (The food processor predates Bubbie Katz).

Find a large pot for stock. Put in 2 cups of water, add carrots, celery, onions, 3 tablespoons of salt. Bring to boil. Add 2 more cups of water and simmer 40 minutes.

Mix ground fish with eggs, pepper, salt, sugar, matzah meal, 10 cloves of mashed garlic. Refrigerate. Let sit for an hour. Wet hands. Shape fish in 3 inch oblong balls.

Remove carrots from the pot, put some fish heads and tails on the bottom of the pot. Place a layer of fish balls. Cover them with carrots. Add another layer of fish head and tails, fish balls layer, and carrots. Continue layering the fish. The top layer should be fish heads and tails.

Boil on medium heat covered. Simmer for three hours. Turn it off. Let sit for half an hour. Drain. Remove fish balls and carrots. Refrigerate. Tastes better the next day. Serve garnished with carrots.

Dietician urges diabetics to 'think veggies' at Pesach

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO – Life goes on for diabetics, even on Pesach, dietician Marsha Rosen told a meeting of the Jewish chapter of the Canadian Diabetes Association.

"Most of the food is there for you to plan a proper diet. It may be more challenging [to plan properly], but the food is there."

It is all a question of "being in control of your own destiny," Rosen said.

The new Canada's Food Guide is a good basis for planning meals, she said, with its emphasis on starches, vegetables and fruits, and finally dairy and protein foods.

She reminded the audience to "think veggies," as fruits are carbohydrates, which have to be monitored. "Even vegetables are not unlimited" in the diabetic diet, Rosen noted.

The seder is a special challenge, Rosen said. Often too much protein is consumed, she said, using as an example the boiled egg, gefilte fish and brisket.

"While protein is essential to provide raw material for enzymes and hormones to work properly, it is also one of the biggest contributors of fat to the diet."

Balance and variety are the bywords, Rosen said. For instance, she suggested dealing with the lateness of the seder meal by having a snack of a fruit and a starch, and leaving the protein allowance for the seder.

The snack is important because "it is important to prevent your blood sugar from taking a nose dive," she said.

Other snacks might be farfel and milk, or nuts, "but remember that nuts are high in fats."

At the seder, you can have just about anything you are offered, she said, but in limited quantities. "You can have stewed fruit, for instance — but not three cups of it."

Key rule: limit quantities

Wine is a problem for diabetics at the seder, since one-third cup of sweet wine is one sugar exchange, and the ritual requirements are for four cups. According to an information sheet given out at the program, the total amount of wine that must be drunk by diabetics is 6.4 oz., which can be achieved by diluting grape juice or wine with water.

The sheet notes that one's doctor and rabbi should be consulted for accurate medical and halachic rules.

Matzah is also an issue that should be discussed with your doctor and rabbi. While the healthy person is obligated to eat a substantial amount of matzah (the exact amounts vary slightly according to the rabbinic source used), the sheet suggests that the Rambam allows two-thirds of a hand baked matzah or one whole machine-baked matzah over the entire seder.

"The secret is to enjoy Pesach — but in moderation."

The chapter gave out several Pesach recipes. One is for matzah cheese apple treat, that gives one protein choice, 1½ starchy choice, 1½ fruit and vegetable choice and one fat and oil per serving.

MATZAH CHEESE APPLE TREAT

1 cup water
½ tsp. cinnamon
1 small apple, cored, peeled and thinly sliced
1 matzah
1 oz. cheese slice

Preheat oven to broil.

Add water to small saucepan. Add cinnamon and apple slices. Bring to boil. Reduce heat and simmer until apple is tender. Drain.

Wet matzah with warm water on both sides. Place under preheated broiler (second rung from top). Broil for one minute on first side. Turn and broil for 30 seconds on second side.

Place drained apples on matzah. Top with cheese. Broil until cheese melts.

Serves one

Something new with potatoes

CRISPY POTATO RÖSTI

4 large potatoes
1 medium onion, chopped
½ tsp. salt
⅛ tsp. pepper
½ tsp. nutmeg
4 tbsp. butter

Cook potatoes, covered, in 1 inch boiling water for only 10 minutes. Drain. Cool potatoes to room temperature, at least 2 hours. Grate potatoes by hand and mix with onion, salt, pepper and nutmeg.

Melt 2 tablespoons butter in 8-inch non-stick skillet. Add potato mixture and flatten to cover bottom of skillet. Over medium heat, pan fry for 10 minutes, or until bottom surface is well browned. Shake pan frequently to prevent sticking. Slide rösti, all in one piece, onto large plate. Cover with plate of identical size and carefully flip. Melt remaining butter in skillet. Slide rösti, browned side up, back into skillet. Cook the same as for first side. Slide onto serving platter and cut into wedges. Serves 4.

SAVORY STUFFED ONIONS

8 large cooking onions
¼ tsp. salt
1 can tomatoes
½ lb. ground beef
1 clove garlic, finely chopped
1 tsp. dried parsley
½ tsp. dried basil leaves
¼ tsp. dried oregano leaves
¼ tsp. salt
⅛ tsp. pepper

Slice top off onions and peel. In large saucepan, sprinkle onions with ¼ tsp. salt, cover with boiling water and simmer, covered, 10 minutes. Drain and cool.

Carefully cut centres from onions, leaving shells ½-inch thick. Chop onion centres by hand or in a food processor.

Drain canned tomatoes, reserving juice. In large skillet, brown beef. Drain off fat. Add chopped onion, drained tomatoes, garlic, parsley, basil, oregano, salt and pepper. Cook 10 minutes over medium heat.

Stuff filling into onion shells. Place in flat casserole or baking dish. Pour reserved tomato juice around stuffed onions. Bake at 350 15 to 20 minutes until onions are tender.

Meat loaf is the original comfort food — this is a little different:

POTATO MEAT LOAF

2 lb. ground meat
1 cup tomato juice
1 chopped onion
2 cups shredded raw potato
1 tbsp. chopped parsley
1 shredded carrot
2 beaten eggs

Mix all ingredients together and shape into a 9 inch loaf pan. Bake at 375 degrees for one hour or until done. Serves 6.

Helpful hints make cooking easier on Pesach

PASSOVER HINTS

• To kosher a microwave: Wash all surfaces thoroughly. Dry well. Do not use for 24 hours. Microwave 2 cups water on high for 10 minutes. Wipe oven dry. Line bottom of oven with parchment paper. It withstands temperatures to 400 F.

• Many recipes can be adapted for Passover use. Use matzah meal for bread or cracker crumbs; ground mandlach for a nice golden color to coat chicken. To substitute graham cracker crumbs use cookie crumbs, eir kichlach or mandlebrot.

• To replace chocolate chips, use bittersweet Passover chocolate bars. Use equal amounts of white sugar in place of brown sugar. Use Passover liqueur such as Sabra to replace vanilla.

• Egg whites beat up quicker and with more volume if you bring them to room temperature before beating and add a pinch of salt and some lemon juice. They separate easier when taken from the refrigerator. Do not beat in a plastic bowl.

• Substitutions: ¼ cup matzah cake meal + ¾ cup potato starch = 1 cup flour; ⅓ cup sugar processed in blender or food processor + ½ tsp. potato starch = ⅓ cup confectioners sugar (icing sugar); 1 tbsp. potato starch = 1 tbsp. cornstarch; 3½ matzahs = 2 cups farfel.

• Run out of matzah meal? Process broken matzah or farfel in blender or food processor to medium or fine consistency.

• Run out of cake meal? Process matzah meal to a very fine consistency.

• To increase fibre, use whole wheat matzah and fresh fruits and vegetables.

Passover Foods

No chametz in these non-food products

As a service to the community, the Kashruth Council of Toronto (COR) has circulated a request to drug firms and other related manufacturers asking them to provide us with a list of ingredients in their products.

All products ingested during Passover should have a "Kosher for Passover" endorsement. If "Kosher for Passover" products are not available and there is a medical need for any of the products, these items should be used in separate utensils.

COR has not supervised the production of these products, but from the information received, there appears to be no chametz in the products listed here.

Generally, when taking medication during Passover, preference should be given to non-chewable tablets rather than liquids and chewable tablets. Many products contain ingredients that are only permitted to be used on Passover for medical reasons. A competent rabbi who is familiar with the information upon which this flyer is based must be consulted prior to the use of these products. If there is any item that you must take during Passover and it is not found with reliable Passover supervision, please contact your rabbi who may have additional information.

For prescription and over the counter medications, call the kashruth council or your rabbi.

Milk Enzyme: Lactaid Tablets, Caplets and Drops should not be used on Passover. In case of great need, lactose free milk should be purchased before Passover. Use separate utensils.

Infant Formula (Kitnyos): All infant formulas listed below should be used in separate utensils. Formula is available in liquid and powder. Check each container for a hechsher, since not all forms are kosher endorsed. Alactamil, Enfalac, Isomil, Prosobee, Similac, Enfamil.

Nutritional Supplements (Kitnyos): These products are not produced under Passover supervision. They should be used only when there is no alternative in consultation with a rabbi. Boost, Isocal, Ensure, Sustacal.

Oral Care: Kosher for Passover toothpaste is recommended. Johnston & Johnston dental floss (unwaxed and unflavored), Polident.

The following oral care products are kitnyos: Crest Regular, Crest Coolmint Gel, Crest For Kids Sparkle Gel; Colgate Regular, Colgate Superstar; Fasteeth; Poligrip; Corega.

Mouthwash: Listerine — Regular, Coolmint, Freshburst; Steri/Sol.

Aluminum Products: Special Passover certification is not required; any brand bearing kosher endorsement may be used.

Paper Products: Plates: Use plastic or styrofoam plates for foods that contain moisture. Paper plates are permissible for cold, dry foods. Parchment Paper: Peterson/Norscan Silicone Paper; Baker's Mate Cooking Parchment Paper.

Some napkins and paper towels may contain starch; therefore, some suggest that they not come in contact with wet foods, i.e. latkes. The following, however, are free from starch: Scott Clean, Ultra and Viva Paper Towels; Scott Napkins. In all cases, it is preferable not to use the first and last three sheets.

Miscellaneous Baby Products: All Alcohol Free Baby Wipes. Johnson's Baby Powder; Johnson's Baby Powder Pure Cornstarch.

Alcohol: Isopropyl rubbing alcohol (any).

Deodorants: Old Spice Stick Deodorant/High Endurance; Old Spice Solid Antiperspirant; Secret Aerosol (all); Mennen Stick (all scents); Lady Speed Stick (all scents); Crystal Clean Stick (all scents).

Hairspray: Vidal Sassoon; Pantene.

Fragrance: Charlie; Ciara; Enjoli; Jean Nate; Revlon Fragrances; Ultima II Fragrances.

Skin Care: Almay Time-Off Toner; Almay Time-Off Moisture Lotion; Almay Time-Off Cleanser; Revlon Results Day-Light Replenisher Moisture Lotion/Moisturizer Oil-Free Fluid; Moon Drops Nourishing/Soothing Moisture Lotion.

After Shave: Old Spice (regular and sensitive); Blue Stratos.

Shampoo and Conditioners: Head & Shoulders; Pert Plus; Ivory & Ivory Plus Shampoos; Vidal Sassoon; Pantene; Flex.

Cleansers: Spic and Span powder; Mr. Clean; Murphy's Oil Soap; Ajax powder.

Oven Cleaner: Any brand.

Spray Startch: Glide Liquid Starch.

Dishwasher Detergents: Palmolive Automatic Dishwasher Gel (all scents) with a hechsher; Manual dishwashing liquid (must bear an OU): Joy, Ivory and Dawn.

Coffee: All unflavored, regular and decaf. Nescafe and Hills Brothers instant coffees bearing COR 141 are acceptable without Passover certification. MJB ground roasted coffee (regular and decaf.) bearing COR 141 are acceptable as well. Maxwell House instant coffee bearing an MK may be used for Passover. Sanka bearing an MK may be used for Passover.

Artificial Sweeteners: Sweet n Low (powder) with an OU and Passover symbols is available.

Silver Polish: Hagerty Silver Polish with an OU may be used.

Book offers international adventures in cooking

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

It's always fun to see cookbooks from other countries. Naturally, one looks at them with the realization that one's own mother prepared things better, and if you are conceited, you do too.

Ethnocentrism aside, few peoples are as adept at adapting foods of the countries in which they live as the Jews are. Not only do they pick up recipes, but they change them just enough to follow kosher guidelines. And somehow the food still tastes great.

Kosher Kettle; International Adventures in Jewish Cooking, edited by Sybil Ruth Kaplan (Five Star Publications, 1996) is a recent, and enjoyable addition to the international Jewish cooking genre. Kaplan has collected material from such diverse places as the Amish community in Pennsylvania, Romania, the southern United States, Indonesia, Israel, Russia and New Zealand.

She also includes a section for the different Jewish holidays.

A nice touch is the extensive selection of delightful-sounding drinks, from mulled wine to mocha cappacino.

TZIMMES

4 lb. brisket
2 onions, sliced
1 ¼ cups water
1 ½ tbsp. Passover brown sugar, or regular sugar
¼ tsp. Passover nutmeg
¼ cup apricots
¼ cup prunes
8 carrots, sliced
4 sweet potatoes, peeled and sliced
4 white potatoes, peeled and sliced

Preheat oven to 300. Pierce meat with fork. Place in roaster. Add onions and brown on top of stove.

Add water, sugar and nutmeg. Place in 300 oven. Allow 45 minutes per pound. One hour before done, add apricots, prunes, carrots and potatoes. Serves 10-12.

Leftover ideas

You are bound to have leftover chicken after the seder, and sometimes it is hard to find interesting things to do with it. Enjoy these two suggestions.

CHICKEN STIR-FRY

2 tbsp. Passover olive oil
1 small red pepper, cut into 2-in. long, thin strips
4 green onions, cut into small rings
1 cup thinly sliced celery
1 cup sliced carrots
⅛ tsp. Passover paprika
2 finely minced garlic cloves
¼ tsp. Passover ginger
½ lb. sliced fresh mushrooms other vegetables if desired, such as broccoli or cauliflower florets, zucchini sliced thin, or bok choy pinch salt
3 cups cooked, diced chicken

In a large skillet, heat oil: add red pepper, green onions, celery, carrots, other vegetables if using, paprika and garlic. Saute until tender. Add ginger, salt and mushrooms, and cook for an additional five minutes. Lower the heat and add the chicken. Heat thoroughly.

Serve over farfel, or Passover noodles.

ASPARAGUS CHICKEN SALAD
(Foodland Ontario)

1 lb. asparagus, cut into 1-in. pieces
2 hard-cooked eggs, chopped
2 cups diced cooked chicken
½ cup sliced radishes
¼ cup Passover oil
1 tbsp. lemon juice
1 tbsp. Passover mayonnaise
¾ tsp. salt
¼ tsp. dried Passover tarragon
4 leaf lettuce leaves (opt.)

Steam asparagus until tender-crisp. Drain and run under cold water to chill. Pat dry. In salad bowl, combine asparagus, eggs, chicken and radishes. Cover and chill.

In small bowl, whisk together remaining ingredients until smooth. Cover and chill.

Just before serving, pour dressing over salad and toss gently. Serve on lettuce leaves, if desired. Serves 4.

Apple salad a festive treat

FESTIVE APPLE SALAD
(Foodland Ontario)

Chunks of red delicious apples, tossed with a ginger lime dressing, make a light-tasting, refreshing salad. This is great as a side dish for a heavy meat meal, or add chunks of cheese to make it a lunch on its own.

Salad

4 red delicious apples, unpeeled, cored and cubed
½ cup sliced celery
½ cup halved, seedless green grapes
¼ cup slivered almonds, toasted

Dressing

2 tbsp. Passover oil
2 tbsp. Passover mayonnaise
½ tsp. grated lime rind
2 tbsp. lime juice
1 tsp. sugar
1 tsp. finely grated ginger root
¼ tsp. salt

In large bowl, combine all salad ingredients. Whisk together all dressing ingredients. Pour over salad and toss gently. Cover and chill at least one hour, to allow flavors to blend.

To toast almonds, place on baking sheet. Bake at 350 for 3 to 5 minutes or until golden brown. Serves 8.

Passover Foods

Yummie yams make a great casserole dish for the holidays

YAM CASSEROLE

3 lbs. sweet potatoes or yams, cooked, peeled, sliced in 1/2" slices
1 cup dried apricots, simmered in water till plump, and drained. Save liquid
1 tart apple, peeled, cored, grated
1 small can crushed pineapple, drained
2 tsp. grated orange rind
1/2 cup orange juice
1/2 cup liquid from apricots
1/2 cup brown sugar

Combine all ingredients. Bake, uncovered in greased three-quart casserole in 375 oven for 40 min. Sprinkle with 1/2 cup chopped nuts if desired. May be made ahead and chilled before baking. Serves 8 to 10.

MATZAH FRUIT KUGEL

5 matzot
6 large eggs
2 red apples, shredded with peel
1 small pear, shredded with peel
¾ cup golden raisins
3 tbsp. sugar
grated peel of 1 lemon
1 tbsp. lemon juice
1 tsp. cinnamon
2 tsp. Passover vanilla
2 tbsp. margarine, unsalted
2 tbsp. sugar mixed with ½ tsp. cinnamon
2 tbsp. Passover current jelly

Preheat oven to 325.

Break matzot into pieces in a bowl and cover with water. Soak 2 minutes and drain.

Beat eggs until fluffy. Stir in apples, pear, raisins, sugar, lemon peel, lemon juice, cinnamon and vanilla. Mix together. Add matzot and blend.

Place margarine in a 9 x 13 casserole and heat in a 325 oven until melted. Swish margarine around in pan so it is coated well. Pour excess margarine into matzot-fruit mixture. Stir, then pour into casserole, spreading evenly.

Mix sugar and cinnamon in a bowl and sprinkle on top of casserole. Top with jelly. Bake 45 min. Serves 10-12.

Fight against hate moves to the Internet

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

OTTAWA — The "brave new world of cyberspace" has "raised the stakes" in the battle against hate on the Internet, says the Canadian Human Rights Commission.

In its 1996 annual report submitted to Parliament last month, the commission concedes that some Canadians "would say we have already passed the point when prevention [of cyber-hate] is feasible, let alone desirable."

Curbing hate on the Internet and via telephone messages "is not becoming any easier, as both the technologies and user-access develop," the commission notes in its 103-page report to Justice Minister Allan Rock.

Complaint against Zundel's web site

"No doubt," it states, "attempts to proscribe hate speech should be a tool of last resort."

The report gives a nod to the Internet's Nizkor Project, run by Ken McVay in British Columbia, which challenges Holocaust revisionists.

Last year, the commission was still trying to put a stop to telephone hate messages, "with somewhat mixed results." In November, it received two complaints that pro-Nazi publisher Ernst Zundel's Internet Web site "could expose Jews to hatred or contempt."

The complaint was brought by the Toronto Mayor's Committee on Race Relations, and Sabina Citron, who launched earlier, unsuccessful criminal charges against Zundel.

Last month, the Federal Court of Canada denied a government motion to dismiss Zundel's application for a judicial review of the case. But at the same time, the court said it would not delay the commission's case against Zundel while the judicial review is dealt with.

The commission will begin preliminary hearings on the Web site May 26. It will be the first time a commission tribunal will consider a complaint involving messages on the Internet.

In its report, the commission notes the January 1996, Federal Court case involving Tony McAleer and the far-right Canadian Liberty Net, based on complaints that telephone messages on the group's hotline violated human rights laws.

The commission asked the court for an interim injunction to prevent the playing of the messages. The court obliged, but the Liberty Net then directed callers to a U.S. phone number.

The court found the group guilty of contempt and sentenced McAleer to jail. But the Liberty Net appealed both the injunction and the conviction.

Ultimately, the court sided with the Liberty Net, ruling that no one has the right to block any communication before its legality can be determined. But it upheld McAleer's contempt sentence.

The commission has been granted leave to appeal the matter of the injunction to the Supreme Court of Canada.

The lower court's overturning of the injunction "has limited our ability to attack the ongoing harm created by hate lines," the report says.

Also last year, the report said, the Federal Court dismissed the commission's application for a contempt of court order against the neo-Nazi Heritage Front, leader Wolfgang Droege and member June French.

The matter went back to 1994, when the Front agreed to an order to stop playing telephone messages. The complaint had been brought by Canadian Jewish Congress and the Native Canadian Centre.

In April 1995, based on a Heritage Hotline message, the commission asked the Federal Court for a contempt charge for ignoring the order.

The court declined, saying the 1995 message was not similar to the one covered by the 1994 court order. As well, the court was not satisfied that the later message was likely to promote hatred or contempt of the Jewish community, the report states.

Government backs Sharon Home project

By MYRON LOVE
Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The 234-bed Sharon Home, Winnipeg's Jewish nursing home, has received the green light from the province to go ahead and replace 60 outdated beds.

The government announced its financial support of the program in its March 14 budget.

"We are very pleased that the government viewed our capital needs as a priority," says Daniel Ruth, the Sharon Home's executive director.

"Ours was one of only six health-care capital projects that the government approved in the budget."

The beds to be replaced are hostel-type beds which, Ruth says, are not up to the standards of Level 3 and 4 personal care home residents.

There is one catch in the government's support for the project, Ruth notes. That is that the community or organization involved has to come up with 20 percent of the capital cost to a maximum of $6 million. He estimates that the project will cost at most $6.5 million.

While the wing housing the 60 beds will be closed, Ruth reports that no decision has been made yet on whether to add the new beds to the current north Winnipeg facility or build a new extension of the residence in south Winnipeg.

"We are currently engaged in a fact finding process," he says. "We are exploring all of our options before we make any final decisions.

"Hopefully by the fall, we will have a clearer sense of the direction we will take."

Bronfman's comments surprise Quebec Jews

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Community leaders reacted with surprise to World Jewish Congress president Edgar Bronfman's remarks that young Jews should leave Quebec if they fear anti-Semitism and that, if he was young, he wouldn't stay.

The quotes were from an interview Bronfman gave to the Toronto Star.

"Anti-Semitism is absolutely not an issue," insisted Laurence Paperman, a founder of ProMontreal, FEDERATION CJA's program to encourage youth to stay in Quebec, mainly by helping them find jobs. "It's not a factor in people's decision to leave."

Paperman said that any animosity among Quebec nationalists is directed at anglophones, not Jews as such. "Our only concern with nationalism is if it leads to separation."

He does not think the Bronfman story will have much impact on youth here.

"The impact is greater outside Quebec...People love to hear negative things about Quebec."

While this episode may not have a major impact, Robert Libman, regional director of B'nai Brith Canada, thinks "it's definitely not helpful.

"When people are weighing the pros and cons, this might be a small consideration. For people who already have one foot out the door, this will just confirm their will to leave."

Libman thinks Bronfman "exaggerated" the mood among Quebec Jews. "Montreal is still a great place for Jews. It's not a haven for anti-Semitism. Political uncertainty and the greater opportunity for employment elsewhere is what is making young Jews decide to leave.

"There are always trade-offs. Maybe there's more political stress here, but Montreal offers a great quality of life," he said.

Jack Jedwab, Quebec region director of Canadian Jewish Congress, said it should be remembered there was a big "if" in much of what Bronfman said.

"No study has found that Jews leave Quebec because of anti-Semitism, so it's difficult to come to that conclusion," he said.

Jedwab doubt the remarks will be "particularly damaging...Most people, youth included, have a good idea of what the issues are, and will make their decision on their own."

A Message to the Toronto Jewish Community

We at Aish HaTorah wish to clarify that the view of Orthodoxy is that we are bound by the Almighty's instructions at Sinai to believe that:

Every Jew, whether Reform, Conservative, Reconstructionist, Orthodox, Secular Humanist, atheist or unafilliated, regardless of his or her level of Torah observance:

- is 100% Jewish. There are no fractions of Jewishness.
- is included in the mitzvah of "Love your fellow as yourself".
- is precious in the eyes of the Almighty.

Every mitzvah is infinitely valuable, regardless of whether it or other mitzvot are always performed. And further, the Torah teaches that no one can judge who is considered a better person or Jew.

Our tradition records that the Temple was destroyed because of causeless hatred. Only unconditional love will rebuild our people.

We call upon all Jews in Toronto to take action for Jewish unity.

Anyone interested in learning about or helping a new initiative for unity, co-sponsored by Aish HaTorah and B'nai Brith Canada is encouraged to call:

Nova Scotia Irishman leads klezmer band

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — Bob McCarthy was once a Catholic priest. Now married and a professor at Acadia University's School of Music in Wolfville, N.S., the tall Irishman leads a five-piece klezmer band, Emerald Swing, in a variety of Jewish melodies for a Jewish audience at Shaar Shalom Synagogue in Halifax.

More than 150 men, women and children clap along with the upbeat music. A few dance, others sing at this celebration of Jewish Music Month.

The band shares the stage with a community choir, a dozen men and women who have trained under the local music maven Shirley Burnstein. They entertain with harmonic renditions of familiar Hebrew and Israeli songs.

"It's a home-grown program," says Jon Goldberg, executive director of the Atlantic Jewish Council which co-sponsored the concert with the synagogue. "When we discovered the klezmer band in Wolfville, it made sense to bring them to the city [100 kilometres] to perform along with our choir.

"We've been able to bring Jewish music to our people without a major cost. Hopefully, we can take our choir to other Atlantic centres to share their love of, and ability in, Jewish music."

McCarthy and various members of his group have played klezmer music for 10 years, "off and on. Last summer we did a bar mitzvah on a mountainside in the Annapolis Valley [of Nova Scotia]. An Israeli general who was attending called us 'the best Irish klezmer band I've heard.'"

The former priest calls this music "therapeutic. As a teacher, I don't get a chance to play that much, and particularly do this."

McCarthy plays clarinet and other reed instruments. William Bishop, a retired media person, plays bass. Ed Kuhn, a piano tuner by trade, plays keyboard. Music student Angie MacIvor plays saxophone and Ken Shorley, a professional percussionist, performs on drums.

The band plays And The Angels Sing, an old Benny Goodman standard, and McCarthy tells the audience the famous clarinetist and band leader is "the best example of one who has come out of this type of music. His improvisations really show klezmer-sounding riffs."

McCarthy leads the band in a short rendition of Irish Washerwoman and says, "Let's move to a minor key, and have a klezmer sound. We'll call it Yiddishe Washerwoman."

McCarthy talks of the history of klezmer music, tracing it briefly from Eastern Europe to a hiatus when many who had it in their blood came to North America but lost their identity.

"A bunch of kids in Boston 20 years or so ago thought the music of their parents and grandparents was hot and started playing it."

He laughs. "Now it has worked it's way down to a bunch of 'goys' from the Valley-Yiddishe Max and the klezmir Mountain Boys."

None Is Too Many premieres to enthusiastic audience

By MYRON LOVE
Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — "I think it is a dynamite production," says Irving Abella of None Is Too Many, the stage play that premiered recently in Winnipeg, to an enthusiastic response.

"At the end, you are not sure whether to applaud or cry. The play delivers a strong and profound message. I hope it will go far beyond Winnipeg."

Adapted for the Winnipeg Jewish Theatre (WJT) by Toronto-based playwright Jason Sherman, None Is Too Many is based on the book of the same name written by Abella and Harold Troper in the 1980s. It is the story of Canada's deplorable wartime record of virtually closing the country's doors to European Jewry at the height of Nazi persecution and murder.

The WJT actually began working on the project in 1991. It wasn't until Sherman was brought in late in 1994 though that None Is Too Many began to take shape.

"It sounded like a great project," Sherman recalls. "The material was strong. It was a story that needed to be told. Another writer had dropped out of the project."

Sherman remembers that he was "airlifted" into Winnipeg. The WJT had actors and were ready to workshop None Is Too Many, but there was no writer. "We put it together in two weeks," Sherman says.

A year later, the play was revised and "workshopped" again. Sherman was actually still working on the finished product almost right up to curtain time.

Jason Sherman

'Jason is a bold writer'

"Jason is a bold writer not afraid to take risks," notes Kayla Gordon, the WJT's artistic director. "Once he determined to focus on Canadian Jewish Congress leader Saul Hayes as the main character, it all came together."

The time frame of the play is from Kristallnacht in November 1937 to 1946. It begins and ends with Hayes' presentation to a Senate committee in Ottawa condemning the Canadian government's inaction during the war and requesting that Canada open its doors to the survivors.

The body of the play is a series of confrontations between Hayes and Ottawa bureaucrats and politicians interspersed with vignettes in Europe, Montreal and Winnipeg which capture the history of the war as it affected Jews in Europe and Canadian Jewry's fruitless efforts to help.

The most riveting scene is an encounter between Hayes and Blair, the anti-Semitic head of the immigration department, over the question of bringing 1,000 Jewish orphans stuck in Vichy France to Canada. The viewer watches the two playing a game of cat and mouse, with Blair forcing Hayes to choose which 500 of the orphans to bring over. While he is mulling it over, Blair regretfully informs Hayes that the Nazis have occupied Vichy France and it is too late to help the children.

The play was mounted jointly by the WJT and the Manitoba Theatre Centre, Winnipeg's major theatre. Sherman felt that the production was well received by the opening night crowd. Gordon reports that there has been interest from other theatres in staging the play and there are hopes for a national tour.

Anti-Semitic incidents up slightly in '96 in Winnipeg

By MYRON LOVE
Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Winnipeg Police Service Hate Crimes unit has reported a slight increase in anti-Semitic incidents in 1996, compared to 1995.

Sgt. Norman Tchir says there were 12 incidents in 1996 (there were 10 the year before) ranging from vandalism and arson at a Jewish Child and Family Service group home for boys in North Winnipeg, to sprayed on graffiti, seven incidents of hate mail or literature and one phone message.

Arrests were made in two cases. No arrests have been made yet in the most serious incident involving the group home, where a worker's car was set on fire. The investigation is continuing.

So far this year, Tchir reports that there have been two incidents of anti-Semitic graffiti. The most recent one was March 20, when a furniture store had "Camp Auschwitz" spray-painted on one side of the building and "Die Jew Pig" on the other.

Online game combats hate, racism on Internet

By MYRON LOVE
Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — An online game, Erasing The Hydra of Hate, was introduced by Michelle Falardeau-Ramsay, chief commissioner, Canadian Human Rights Commission (CHRC) at a recent symposium.

The game, aimed at combating hate on the Internet, started as a poster and game called Stop the Hatred, developed by Choices, a Winnipeg social justice group.

The poster, decorated with snakes, features a quiz that tests young people's knowledge of discrimination and hate crimes. The reverse side is a game board with each square describing a positive or negative reaction to hate propaganda and the resulting reward or punishment.

The Internet version, which can be found at CHRC's Web site [www.chrc.ca], was created by Winnipeg graphic designer Steven Rosenberg for the CHRC after Choices invited the commission to get involved in the project.

Rosenberg was on hand at the symposium sponsored by B'nai Brith Canada's League for Human Rights to demonstrate how Erasing the Hydra of Hate works.

"This is an interactive game," he said. "The computer explains why your answers are correct or incorrect. If you answer incorrectly, you are given a second chance. The game is accessible to anyone with a modem."

Choices spokesperson, Randa Stewart, said that the game's development was spurred by two events — the beating of a Choices supporter by racists with whom he had gotten into an argument, and a report about neo-Nazis recruiting in Winnipeg elementary schools.

"Brochures and user guides will shortly be distributed to all elementary school teachers in Manitoba," Stewart said.

Purim, Pesach teach lessons about survival, tolerance

By RABBI CHAIM STEINMETZ

Can different types of Jews be a part of the same community? According to a recent report, a fringe group of ultra-Orthodox rabbis known as the Union of Orthodox Rabbis declared Conservative and Reform movements to be "not Jewish." Although this pronouncement was made by a fringe group, we have to wonder, can different types of Jews be a part of the same community?

Guest Voices

"I'd like to approach this issue by examining some similarities shared by the holidays of Purim and Passover. (No, starting with the letter "P" doesn't count). Both these holidays celebrate the redemption of the Jewish people. And both teach lessons about the relationship between survival and tolerance.

One similarity between Purim and Passover is the emphasis on charity. For both holidays, there are specific charities to ensure that the poor can celebrate the holiday properly. On Purim, the book of Esther directs people to give matanot l'evyonim, gifts to the poor, which the poor can use to celebrate Purim properly. On Passover, the Mishnah (Pesachim 99b) tells us that even the poorest person was provided with four cups of wine for the seder. Even though wine is a luxury item that we wouldn't normally distribute to the poor, we provide it to poor people on the eve of Passover so that they can celebrate the seder properly.

Another similarity is that both holidays emphasize the involvement of children. On Purim, there is a custom to bring young children to hear the Megillah reading (Tur 689). Children dress in costumes and make noise with graggers when Haman's name is mentioned. On Passover, the entire seder is structured to get the children to ask questions (Pesachim 109a, 115b). The four questions which start the seder, are recited by the youngest child present. The afikomen game, where a piece of matzah is held "ransom" by the children of the home, is meant to keep the children involved and excited throughout the seder.

What is the meaning of these similarities? Since both Purim and Passover celebrate survival and redemption, we have large, festive meals. Great care is taken to include all members of the community. On both holidays, hospitality is featured. Even though children are not expected to participate in these holidays until they are older, an exciting, child-friendly atmosphere is created to involve them. The needy, who normally cannot afford these lavish holiday meals, are provided with all their needs. This is because survival includes the entire community, no matter what age or tax bracket. And when celebrating survival, we want to make sure we celebrate as a community, uniting everyone together.

However, if creating a sense of community is the theme of Purim and Passover, a final similarity is quite puzzling. Purim and Passover are the only Jewish holidays that are celebrated on different days by different groups. Purim is celebrated by most communities on the 14th of Adar and by communities in walled cities on the 15th of Adar. The Passover seder is celebrated on the 15th of Nissan. However, in ancient times if one could not bring a Passover sacrifice in time for the seder, they could bring it on the "Second Passover" which was observed a month later, on the 15th of Iyar.

If the purpose of these holidays is to create a sense of community, that every last person is included, than why do they allow for such division, for different groups to observe the holidays on different days?

I think the answer is that in order to have community, we must have tolerance. Unity is possible if we don't demand unanimity. Passover and Purim are community holidays, but we have to realize not everyone in the community is alike. And so the two holidays that emphasize community are the ones that emphasize diversity as well. Unity and tolerance go hand in hand.

This lesson about unity is profoundly important to our people today. As an Orthodox rabbi, I certainly have enormous disagreements with the Reform and Conservative movements. I do not accept the arguments of those who relativize the differences between our movements, and see us as two sides of the same coin. Realistically, the differences between Orthodoxy and the liberal movements are far too profound to be considered a minor dispute.

However, despite these large differences, we can still unite together as one people, if we treat each other with love and tolerance. Unanimity is impossible; people will always have many different opinions. However, we can disagree, without being disagreeable. This is the message of Purim and Passover: A real community must have the flexibility to encompass many types of people.

Israel rejects EU intervention in peace process

By MICHAL YUDELMAN and HILLEL KUTTLER
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — On the eve of Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's meeting with U.S. President Bill Clinton, Israel rebuffed an attempt by the European Union (EU) to become more involved in the Middle East peace process, according to Israeli and European sources.

"We accept the principle that Europe can assist the process and we welcome the envoy's pragmatic input – he is a veteran and experienced diplomat," a senior government source said, after last week's visit by EU envoy Miguel Moratinos. "However, we will not agree to direct European intervention in either the political or economic process."

Meanwhile, the Clinton administration held consultations with the Palestinian Authority (PA) on approaches toward resolving the current stalemate. Special Middle East coordinator Dennis Ross was scheduled to meet with PA representative Hanan Ashrawi.

Palestinian negotiators Saeb Erakat and Mahmoud Abbas were also reportedly scheduled to visit the United States.

PA Chairman Yasser Arafat was en route to India to urge Non-Aligned Movement nations "to support Palestinian political rights and condemn the Israeli settlement activity," his adviser, Nabil Abu Rudeineh, told Reuters.

National security adviser Sandy Berger told CNN that it is "premature" to discuss a Camp David-like summit to repair the breach.

Berger added that the United States believes that final and interim status negotiations can proceed simultaneously.

"First of all, that's process over substance," he said of the summit possibility first mentioned by Netanyahu. "What we need to do first is focus on how we can get the parties back into direct negotiations, re-establish a basis of trust between the parties, so they can be dealing with both the remaining issues in the interim agreement, and get on with the fundamental issues of the final-status agreement.

"So, first things first. First things are back to negotiations, deal with the substance. Let's not worry about which camp we meet at."

Berger also said that the United States "wishes that [Har Choma] hadn't gone forward. We think that it erodes confidence in the process."

Foreign Minister David Levy last week rejected the EU's demand to "freeze" the settlements and the construction work on Har Choma and told Moratinos that if the Europeans insist on these issues and their own proposals, they would lose the status of honest brokers in the dispute.

After meeting with Levy, Moratinos said he is formulating a package deal to solve the crisis. His plan, which he intended to present to the EU heads in Brussels and the Americans this week, is based on hammering out a new "code of behavior" for the resumption of talks, based on stopping terrorism and violence on the Palestinian side and halting the settlements on Israel's.

Moratinos told Levy that he met Arafat, who reiterated his commitment to fight terrorism. Moratinos expressed optimism as to the chances of reviving the peace process.

Levy stressed that Israel does not accept the European conditions and objects to basing the final-status negotiations on Security Council resolutions 242 and 338. He pointed out that while Europe's suggestions could be helpful, they must complement the American proposals, not replace them.

Levy said Arafat's commitment to fight terrorism must be reflected on the ground, and although certain positive acts have been carried out, Arafat still has a lot to do to stop the violence.

Palestinians favor bombings over peace process: poll

By JON IMMANUEL
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Support for the peace process among Palestinians in Jerusalem, Hebron and Bethlehem is at an all-time low and support for suicide bombings is at an all-time high, according to a recently published poll.

Statistician Dr. Nabil Kukali of the Beit Sahur-based Palestinian Centre for Public Opinion conducted the poll among 470 adults. Its margin of error is 3.5 percent.

More of those asked preferred that Haidar Abdel-Shafi, known for his opposition to the Oslo Accords, lead final status talks than Mahmoud Abbas, the deputy of Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat.

The poll showed 30 percent favor continued negotiations, while 37 percent want to abandon the process and 19 percent want to continue it with new delegates.

Abbas received the support of only 9 percent as head of the delegation, while Abdel-Shafi received 16 percent, Faisal Husseini 11.6 percent, Saeb Erekat 10.5 percent, and Hanan Ashrawi 6.6 percent. This gave the four main local personalities at the pre-Oslo Washington talks almost 45 percent support, considerably more than the aggregate support for PLO officials formerly based in Tunis, who figured in the poll.

However, the poll was limited to towns where support for "inside" Palestinian delegates might be expected to be greatest.

The poll indicated growing support for Hamas, with 18 percent saying they would support it in local elections and 13 percent more supporting Islamic independents. Support for Fatah was 26.6 percent. Again, these three cities tend to show greater support for Hamas than the average.

Almost 49 percent support the suicide bombing in Tel Aviv on March 21 which killed three women and wounded dozens. This is an extremely high percentage, especially considering the question was about a particular attack and was not theoretical.

Arbel weighs whether to levy charges in Bar On Affair

By LIAT COLLINS and RAINE MARCUS
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Following a seven-hour meeting last weekend between prosecutors and the police team investigating the Bar-On Affair, the State Attorney's Office said it could not yet determine whether indictments would be filed, but would not rule out the possibility after "supplementary investigations."

A spokesperson for State Attorney Edna Arbel issued a terse statement saying that further meetings might be necessary and that it had been decided to carry out supplementary investigations, but "the State Attorney's Office is at the stage of formulating its conclusions.

"We are checking the material and considering whether there is reason to file indictments, but I will say no more than that."

It is a question not only of whether the evidence is sufficient to warrant charges, but also of whether it would stand up in a courtroom.

Arbel said the complementary investigations "would not change the general picture."

Channel 1, which broke the story that kicked off the investigation, said the police are considering recommending that breach of trust charges be filed against Avigdor Lieberman, director-general of the Prime Minister's Office. Even if such a recommendation is made, however, the final decision on filing charges rests with the State Attorney's Office, which refused to comment on the speculation.

Yesterday's consultations at the Justice Ministry were attended by Arbel; Attorney-General Elyakim Rubinstein; National Investigations chief commander Sando Mazor; the head of the police investigating team, Lt.-Cmdr. Ya'acov Grossman; and other senior representatives of the police and State Attorney's Office.

Both the police and the State Attorney's Office played down reports that there had been a dispute over the need for further meetings.

"All I can say is that we have not presented our recommendations regarding possible indictments in the case, and this is definitely not the last consultation in the probe," said Mazor.

Sources said Mazor was referring to possible new developments first broadcast on Channel 2, in which MK Aryeh Deri's former lawyer, Dan Avi-Yitzhak, and Ma'ariv publisher Ofer Nimrodi were accused of plotting to appoint Avi-Yitzhak as attorney-general, to help both Deri and Nimrodi in their ongoing trials.

Police are now examining this evidence to see if it warrants a full-scale investigation.

Former Ma'ariv reporter Erez Rotem, the source of these allegations, was expected to give evidence this week.

Israel and the Palestinians are at a tense standstill

Arafat, brushing aside the accusation, sent a letter to President Bill Clinton urging him to get Israel to stop building on disputed land.

Clinton has been working on a plan that American officials hope will help the two sides break the deadlock.

One of the central elements under consideration is Netanyahu's call for moving to accelerated final-status talks, rather than getting bogged down in negotiations on outstanding elements of the Israeli-Palestinian agreements.

The Palestinians have reacted cautiously to the idea, saying that they would consider it as long as Israel fulfills its commitments under the Oslo accords, as the agreements are known, including carrying out further redeployments in the West Bank, opening a safe passage between the West Bank and Gaza Strip and approving the opening of a seaport and airport in Gaza.

Reports before Netanyahu's departure indicated that Clinton would press the Israeli leader to make concessions to the Palestinians in order to rebuild an atmosphere of trust.

U.S. officials said talks in Washington between Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai and U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright were "difficult," particularly in the discussion of Israel's construction at Har Choma and in existing Jewish settlements.

In Tel Aviv, thousands of Israelis attended a peace rally last Saturday night to appeal for a renewal of the peace negotiations.

The event took place at the square named after Yitzhak Rabin.

Labor party leader Shimon Peres, who spoke at the site for the first time since the assassination, said he felt as if he was speaking "in the name of Yitzhak" as well.

Peres called for a continuation of the peace process.

"The road is a long one," he said, "but we must continue on it to reach the peace of truth."

During his trip to the United States, Netanyahu is expected to meet with leaders of the Reform and Conservative movements to discuss the Knesset's decision last week to give preliminary approval to a bill that would make all conversions conducted in Israel subject to confirmation by the Orthodox Chief Rabbinate.

Clinton may pressure Netanyahu

That decision drew sharp criticism from the Reform and Conservative movements, some of whose officials have warned that passage of the bill could drive a wedge between Israel and Diaspora Jewry.

Under a compromise reached by the coalition parties, all further legislative action on the bill will now be frozen until "all possible avenues for compromise" with the non-Orthodox streams of Judaism have been exhausted.

Netanyahu will be accompanied at his meetings with American Jewish leaders by Third Way Knesset member Alexander Lubotsky, who is mediating between the religious parties and the non-Orthodox movements.

Israel & the Jewish World

Does Camp David II loom?

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mideast Analysis

Benjamin Netanyahu's meeting with Bill Clinton at the White House on April 7 could usher in a new phase in Israel's often rancorous negotiations with the Palestinians.

If all the parties concur, the step-by-step approach implicit in the Oslo peace process may be replaced by a Camp David style accelerated set of talks aimed at reaching a comprehensive settlement of final status issues within nine months instead of two years.

Netanyahu, who proposed the concept last summer, resurrected it in March as a way of defusing the current crisis in Israel's relationship with the Palestine Authority (PA), headed by Yasser Arafat.

Since the Hebron accord was signed in mid-January, what little trust there was between Netanyahu and Arafat has vanished. It has disappeared under the impact of the Har Choma housing project in East Jerusalem, Israel's decision to close four Palestinian offices in the Old City allegedly affiliated with the PA, the PA's dissatisfaction with the scope of Israel's first of three planned withdrawals from the West Bank and the renewal of the suicide bombing campaign by Islamic militants.

These events have not only generated a great deal of mutual bitterness and suspicion, but effectively frozen the peace process in its tracks.

The PA, whose goal is a Palestinian state in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip with East Jerusalem as its capital, claims that Israel's unilateral actions create facts on the ground, predetermine permanent status negotiations and thus violate the spirit of Olso.

The Israeli government, whose objective is to prevent the emergence of a Palestinian state, claims that its moves are in accord with Oslo. Israel, furthermore, maintains that the PLO sanctions suicide bombings and is behind the current wave of Palestinian violence in the territories.

The breakdown of communications between Netanyahu and Arafat has prompted speculation that a new beginning is required in order to restore at least a modicum of trust and a sense of momentum.

Netanyahu contends that Oslo, of which he was never fond, should be supplanted by a go-for-broke procedure that would enable Israel and the PA to deal with the most contentious issues — Jerusalem, borders, refugees, settlements — on an urgent basis.

This strategy, which the United States regards as worthy of exploration, has the support of Israeli cabinet ministers who opposed the Hebron agreement. Certain that it will fail, they appear to regard it as a last chance to freeze the status quo and therefore scuttle Oslo.

Shimon Peres, leader of the Labor party, considers a plunge into final status talks as feasible. But Ehud Barak, his putative successor, is doubtful.

The Palestinians have expressed deep skepticism, claiming that final status talks at this critical juncture would leave Israel in control of most of the West Bank and thereby strengthen its hand. Consequently, Arafat has rejected the idea as a "peace-for-peace" ploy, while chief PA negotiator Saeb Erekat has described it as a "gimmick." Egypt, too, is lukewarm.

To allay Palestinian fears that his initiative is a trick designed to forestall Israeli redeployments from the West Bank, Netanyahu has declared that both sides can return to the current interim arrangement if speeded-up negotiations should flounder.

King Hussein of Jordan, an advocate of accelerated talks, is of the view that the Palestinians can be brought to the table, provided Israel offers confidence-building measures and further eases the closure of the territories.

The Palestinians, however, desire much more. As a price for resuming negotiations, they want Israel to stop building in East Jerusalem and an assurance that they will gain possession of much of the West Bank. Israel, in addition to demanding an absolute commitment from the PA to suppress terrorism, has warned Arafat to lower his expectations. Can these conflicting demands be reconciled?

An embryonic battle

By Jonathan Shiff

Danny and Ruti Nachmani were married in 1984, and were unable to conceive. In 1987, Ruti had a hysterectomy. They waged a legal battle for the right to use a surrogate mother, and underwent in vitro fertilization, leading to the conception of 11 embryos.

Before the embryos were implanted, however, Danny left his wife, moved in with his current companion, and then sued to prevent Ruti from using them. The resultant case took four years to wind its way through the Haifa District Court and two Supreme Court cases, and was seen by many as a clash between Ruti's right to bear children (these are the last embryos she can produce) and Danny's right not to have children with Ruti.

Finally, the two reached a settlement that should end the litigation once and for all. According to the press, the outlines of the settlement are simple: Danny will have the right to choose; if he wants visitation rights, he will have to support the children. Otherwise he is freed from the financial obligation involved.

The public rightfully seemed to heave a sigh of relief, as this family's tragedy finally came to an end. At the risk of being a party-pooper, though, I would argue that the settlement described will ultimately not be enforced by the courts.

What will happen if Ruti does not have the financial resources to provide the children with a decent standard of living? On the one hand, it can be argued that Danny only agreed to let Ruti use the embryos in return for her undertaking not to ask for money, and forcing him to support them would make her commitment meaningless.

On the other hand, should the children be bound by an agreement their parents made and which deprives them of proper support?

Although this case seems unusual, the courts have dealt with cases where divorcing couples agree on the level of child support. In order to protect the fathers in these situations, lawyers developed a practice of including a clause whereby the children are not allowed to sue.

The courts have held repeatedly over the years that such clauses are invalid. In the words of Justice Dov Levin in the Rosen case from 1985: "The Courts are appointed to protect the welfare of minors, and the court must not validate arrangements which oppress the child and deny him his legal right to sue his father-progenitor to take care of his needs."

The attitude of the courts can be summed up as follows: When people bring a child into the world, they are both responsible for that child. Contractual arrangements between the parents are not upheld in cases where the parent with custody does not have the means to support the child. This approach is based both on the moral idea that where the child's rights conflict with the parent's, the welfare of the child must come first, and on the economic perspective which requires that society should not have to pay for children when the parents can do so on their own.

Some people might say that the Nachmani case is different, since unimplanted embryos cannot have rights. In my view, focusing on that fact merely clouds the central issue of the parents' responsibility. I believe that the courts should and will apply the same principles they do to other divorce settlements.

There is no need to get into the loaded issue of when life actually begins in order to conclude that

Baltimore Jewish Times

BALTIMORE — Every once in a while, life is like a Fellini movie.

So it was at the Sheraton Inner Harbor Hotel here, where recently, some 250 Hillel lay leaders from North America crowded the mezzanine. Imagine the scene: wall-to-wall Jews, all eager for an awaiting lunch in the ballroom, when who should arrive but the Easter Bunny, basket in tow.

Absurd doesn't begin to describe the sight of a six-foot-five rabbit madly weaving his way through a crowd that included five-foot-six rabbis.

But, curiously, this crowd seemed oblivious to the bunny, as if this kind of thing happens all the time. Bunny, on the other hand, quickly turned tail.

As I watched him flee, it became clear to me why the convention delegates seemed not to be distracted by this Fellini-esque moment.

When you work for Hillel: The Foundation for Jewish Campus Life, you are constantly aware of the influences of the dominant culture, but you can't let that distract or deter you.

Like the Blues Brothers, Hillel is on a mission from God. Its task, to inspire a generation of college students to "do Jewish," is daunting.

All but the most committed Jewish students tend to blend into the pastiche of campus life, where friendships are forged not by ethnicity or religious background but by secular interests, residence hall roulette, fraternities and sororities.

No longer bound by family routine and parental oversight for the first time in their lives, college students have to consider for themselves whether to affiliate Jewishly. Mom's not there to say "Go to services Friday night, honey." Dad's not around to say "Date a Jewish guy this weekend, willya?" When kids head off to college, Jewish becomes a choice for the first time in their lives.

The mission of Hillel in the 1990s is to make that choice tempting to college kids.

I don't think we can overstate the importance of Hillel's role in Jewish continuity and identity. Fortunately, the organization has Richard Joel as its president and international director.

Joel, creative, quick-witted and clever, is guiding Hillel through a much-needed renaissance.

His kickoff speech was spiced with one-liners and off-the-cuff humor, but he was neither a jester nor a fool. He projected black-and-white photographs of college students on a big screen behind him as he spoke, all the better to keep the audience's attention focused on those who matter most.

And at a cocktail reception and dinner with a host of Baltimore's top Jewish philanthropists assembled, Joel scored points with his clarity, charm and enthusiasm.

While other Jewish organizations fuss and flounder, bloated by bureaucracy and waste, Hillel seems to be moving forward with speed and a surer sense of purpose.

Joel has condensed a plan of attack into a single sentence: Hillel wants to maximize the number of Jews on campus "doing Jewish" with other Jews.

His strategy is one of engagement. Rather than trying to coerce students to drop by the Hillel House and "be like us," students are encouraged to express their Judaism in whatever way seems comfortable for them, whether it be through activism, community service, or social events. "Be like yourself" is the message, and it seems to be working.

Hillel's Jewish Campus Service Corps is thriving on major campuses and a $200 million endowment campaign is underway to rebuild aging Hillel facilities and erect new structures on campuses across the United States.

Despite the secular distractions of a hip-hop youth culture, Hillel is neither detracted nor deterred. It's determined.

Police target bad drivers

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Drivers can now expect to "meet police vans every seven or 10 kilometres," in an attempt by police and the Transport Ministry to reduce road accidents, Traffic Police chief Bertie Ohayon recently told a Tel Aviv press conference.

Scores of police vehicles and unmarked cars will now patrol 700 kilometres of intercity highways in the year-long, NIS 15 million project, dubbed Project 700.

Highways being included in the new project are those where 60 percent of all accidents occurred last year. The areas being monitored will be marked with large yellow signs. Fifty more policemen are being deployed on the roads for the duration of the project.

All the police vehicles will be equipped with the latest state-of-the art electronic cameras and other devices.

Embryo fight

once children are conceived, both parents bear responsibility for their upkeep. Furthermore, it would be misleading to argue that this might have bearing on other issues, such as abortion, because there is no question involved of the woman's right over her body.

The only issue is the rights of the children once they are born. The circumstances surrounding the Nachmani case are tragic, and most people feel relief and compassion towards them after all that they have been through. Nonetheless, that feeling does not mean the arrangement the couple made has to stand.

If the Nachmani children are born, there is no logical reason to enforce the agreement their parents made. To do so would be to discriminate between the Nachmani children and those who had the good fortune to already have been born when their parents divorced.

The Week in Israel

Mar. 31

• The IDF demolished the Hebron-area home of the suicide bomber who carried out the Tel Aviv attack that killed three Israelis and wounded dozens of others.The High Court rejected a petition from family members to prevent the destruction and gave permission to the army to demolish the home.

April 1

• The Knesset passed first reading of the bill that would give Orthodox rabbis sole authority over conversions to Judaism conducted in Israel. The measure was approved 51-32 with seven abstentions, after a compromise was reached to suspend the legislative process to give the various sides time to work out a compromise.

• Two Palestinians blew themselves up near Jewish communities in the Gaza Strip in what the IDF said appeared to be failed suicide attacks. (Islamic Jihad subsequently claimed responsibility for the failed attacks.)

• Unrest continued in the West Bank. The IDF shot dead two Palestinian demonstrators, one in Nablus and the other in Hebron.

April 2

• Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai began a visit to Washington.

• Labor Party Knesset members held a stormy meeting about the absence of several senior members from the vote earlier in the week on the conversion bill. Notably absent from the voted were Ehud Barak, Yossi Beilin and Ephraim Sneh, all of whom are vying for the party leadership.

April 3

• Israel dropped its extradition request for Hamas leader Mousa Mohammed Abu Marzook, who is jailed in New York on suspicion of providing support for terrorist activities.

April 4

• Police officials were reported in the media to be planning a fivefold increase to their international crime-fighting division to combat organized crime from Russia. Officials are particularly concerned about money-laundering activities.

Barak won't join Beilin in fighting unity government

By SARAH HONIG
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Three of Labor's four leadership candidates have expressed unreserved opposition to joining a national unity government. Front-runner Ehud Barak, however, a staunch opponent of a unity government, refused to join in an anti-unity move with his most serious rival, MK Yossi Beilin.

All this happened at ZOA House in Tel Aviv, where the party's local branch held its convention in advance of the national convention next month. It was the first time all four candidates – Barak, Beilin, and MKs Ephraim Sneh and Shlomo Ben-Ami — appeared together, as Barak had until now refused to appear with the others.

Beilin, in his address, denied claims that "Barak is a Netanyahu clone. That is untrue. The fact is that Barak is 10 times better...If both of us together issue a joint statement against entering a national unity framework with the Likud, then such a government could never be."

But Barak, apparently unwilling to appear to be following Beilin's lead, replied that "the two of us are no better than Sneh or Ben-Ami, or than any central committee member. We must be weaned from the notion that there are masters in the party who can decide without consulting the membership."

He reiterated his position that the current government "must be brought down, not saved."

Of the candidates, only Sneh did not speak out against a national unity government, though he did not support it.

The chief national unity advocate, party chair Shimon Peres, left on a 10-day trip to South America. The Barak camp charges that Peres is eager to bring Labor into the Netanyahu government before the June 3 primary in which his successor will be elected. If he succeeds, Peres would enter the government as Labor's senior minister and will thereby cement his leadership regardless of who wins the primary.

According to the just-concluded party membership drive, only some 160,000 people will be able to participate in the primary. This is down from the membership drive of less than two years ago when 282,000 registered as dues-paying members.

Meanwhile the possible national unity government was the main topic at the executive session of the National Religious Party, which expressed near-unanimous opposition to the notion, and especially to the possibility that the Likud might negotiate national unity without consulting its coalition partners.

The coalition agreement, said party secretary-general Zevulun Orlev, stipulates clearly that no new members may be brought into the coalition without the prior consent of the present members. "To do otherwise would be outright betrayal," Orlev stressed.

Education Minister Zevulun Hammer said he was "far from certain that Netanyahu has actually decided to go ahead with national unity and in any case we are assured that no move will be considered without the present coalition partners."

Nazi snitch line poses choice between bad and worse

They believe that these despicables will meet their ultimate justice in the world beyond.

On that point, I cannot disagree. But there is more to this than the concern for ultimate justice. This entire fiasco has been a blot on Canada's reputation. It is an insult to the memories of our youngest and brightest, who went overseas to fight evil on behalf of Canada, only to find that the perpetrators of this evil were welcomed into Canada.

Surviving veterans are justifiably angry at the thought that they and their best friends put their lives on the line, but the cause they were championing was being undermined by a bunch of anti-Semitic bureaucrats who quite simply hijacked the Canadian ethos.

Only because there is now no time to waste with lengthy investigations must we reluctantly but determinedly endorse the quick route to sending as many Nazis packing as possible.

This will be interpreted as our way of salvaging our past, of saying a loud "no" to those who stole our heritage by disallowing Jews and welcoming Nazis into Canada, of atoning for the sins of yesterday, and of sending a clear signal to any present and future hatemongers and perpetrators of evil — a signal that Canada will never again be a haven for the heartless, a home for the despicable.

This is not merely a Jewish issue. This is a Canadian issue of immediate moment. In our dogged pursuit of this burning issue, we will help Canada to get rid of some ghosts of the past, and to set a firm footing for the future.

Precisely because we did not adequately pursue the noble course when it was available, must we now take the ugly road because there is no alternative.

To do so is undoubtedly painful, and we must be sensitive to that pain. But forge ahead we must, with pain and with resolve.

Supreme Court agrees to hear appeal of alleged war criminals

Last July, Federal Court Judge Bud Cullen ruled that a March 1, 1996 meeting between Ted Thompson, then assistant deputy attorney general, and Julius Issac, Chief Justice of the Federal Court, coupled with a discussion by Isaac with the presiding judge, James Jerome, gave the appearance of interference in the independence of the courts. He granted the stay, bringing the cases to an end.

That decision was overturned by the Federal Court of Appeal, prompting a leave application by the three alleged war criminals.

The decision to set a time limit during which the cases must be heard indicates "the Supreme Court is giving direction to other courts to hear the case with due diligence," said Bernie Farber, a spokesperson for Canadian Jewish Congress. "They understand the need for haste and that these are not ordinary cases."

Pointing to the judgment of the Federal Court of Appeal, a report prepared by former Ontario Chief Justice Charles Dubin for the Justice Department and a decision of the Canadian Judicial Council, all of whom examined the case, Farber said he was confident the Supreme Court will deny a stay. (None agreed with Cullen that the cases should be stayed.)

If the Supreme Court turns down the appeal, the cases would be sent back to the Federal Court for a disposition of other preliminary legal issues. Only after these are heard would the cases proceed on the merits.

Federal authorities are seeking to strip the three men of their Canadian citizenship and deport them for allegedly lying about their involvement in Nazi war crimes. The three are among 12 men federal authorities have said they will seek to deport. One of the 12 has died and the final two were served with legal documents in late March. Their names will not be revealed until their cases are filed with the Federal Court, said Paul Vickery, head of the Justice Department's war crimes unit.

Yom Ha'atzmaut Cartoon Contest

We are seeking cartoons dealing with the subject of Israel. In particular, we are looking for cartoons that have artistic and intellectual merit and which tastefully convey one of the many truths about life in Israel. They may be funny, serious, satiric or cute.

Who can enter: Adults and teenagers are eligible.

How to enter: You may submit as many entries as you like. The judges will choose cartoons that are well-illustrated, clever and tasteful. Two cartoons will be selected from the teenage cartoonists; two will be selected from the remaining submissions. The cartoons must be drawn in black and white. Please write your name, age, address and phone number on the back of your submission.

You may mail or deliver your submission to: CJN Community Contests, The Canadian Jewish News, 1500 Don Mills Rd., Suite 205, North York, Ont., M3B 3K4. If you want us to return the cartoon, please provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope. Otherwise, we will be unable to do so.

The contest closes at 5 p.m. onWednesday, April 30, 1997.

Prizes: The "winners" will be published in The CJN and each cartoonist will receive $25. The judges' decisions will be final. The odds of winning depend upon the number and the quality of submissions received.

How the winners will be notified: The winning cartoonists will be notified by telephone before Shabbat on Friday, May 2, 1997.

When the prizes will be awarded: The winning submissions will be published in The CJN of May 8, 1997. Cheques will be sent shortly afterwards. We look forward to receiving your entries.

Any litigation respecting the conduct and awarding of a prize in this contest may be submitted to the Régie des Loteries et courses du Québec.

Bronstein helps educate public about Inflammatory Bowel Disease

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — From infancy, Diane Bronstein suffered from cramping, nausea and other debilitating problems.

When her two children were young, she underwent gall bladder surgery during which surgeons found severe inflammation in her small intestine and removed part of it.

For the next year, however, symptoms persisted. Weakened and weighing only 67 pounds, she was referred to a gastroenterologist, who diagnosed Crohn's disease.

She says that although she was deathly ill, she was "thrilled" to get a diagnosis. "Even if it wasn't curable, I could finally get a handle on it."

Wanting to learn as much as she could about her condition, she became involved in the local Crohn's and Colitis Foundation of Canada (CCFC), which has 80 chapters.

Twenty-five years later, Bronstein is national president of the foundation, a voluntary, non-profit organization dedicated to finding the cause and cure for Inflammatory Bowel Disease (IBD), funding medical research, and providing educational programs.

Bronstein, who travels across the country speaking with doctors, supporters and IBD sufferers, says the foundation has helped establish two major research centres for intestinal diseases — one at the University of Calgary, and the other at McMaster University in Hamilton.

"We're dealing with an illness that isn't pretty," she says. "This is a closet disease that no one wants to talk about, and we have to make more people aware of IBD and the escalating number of cases in Canada."

She points out that three-quarters of the cases of ulcerative colitis, a form of IBD, develop before age 30.

Crohn's disease, which can affect any part of the gastrointestinal tract, from the esophagus to the anus, is most frequent among Europeans, especially Jews.

Bronstein says the more people she meets, "the more humbled I feel because I realize how lucky I am to function normally after being so ill for so long."

As a child, she says, she didn't know that people didn't have a stomach ache most of the time. "As soon as I finished eating, I had severe cramping."

Doctors often told her parents that their daughter was "a sensitive and high strung child with a nervous stomach."

She cautions that recurring symptoms of vomiting, low grade fever, fatigue, weight loss, diarrhea, and stomach pain may be exacerbated by stress, "but stress is not the cause."

She notes that the disease, which is characterized by alternating periods of flare-up and remission, is not contagious and many people who suffer from Crohn's disease also suffer from allergies — environmental, food and asthma. She emphasizes the importance of seeing a gastroenterologist when these symptoms persist.

The CCFC issued its first research grant in 1976 and since its inception in 1974, more than $16 million has been raised to aid research and education.

"The money raised by CCFC has led to the discovery of new medications and therapies which are bringing relief to tens of thousands of sufferers in Canada," Bronstein says.

One of the major fundraising projects of CCFC is the annual Heel 'n' Wheel-a-Thon which raised more than $285,000 in its 1996 inaugural year. Thousands of people of all ages across Canada participated — walking, skating, on bicycles, with strollers and walkers. Among other fundraising projects are a hamburger day and a cake and cookie campaign.

Bronstein says it is important to learn to live with the disease. "Will you let the disease control your life or will you control your life and deal with what comes along?"

The foundation provides information "so that victims, parents and their families can cope with the disease. We are delighted that the foundation has volunteers who do not suffer from IBD. Canada has the leading edge in research today. We are attracting very high calibre world class researchers."

CCFC has a home page [http: www.ccfc.ca] that provides information on IBD diseases and the activities on the foundation. For information call 1-800-387-1479.

Torontonians Kerzner, Starr are honored at Shaare Zedek conference

NEWPORT BEACH, Calif. — Torontonians Joseph Kerzner and Nathan Starr were recently honored for their dedication and generosity to the Jerusalem-based hospital at the Shaare Zedek Medical Center Inaugural North American Conference here.

The presentation was made by Menno Ratzker, chairman of the Shaare Zedek International board of governors, and Morris Talansky, executive vice-president of the American committee for Shaare Zedek.

At the conference attended by about 100 people, participants were offered current information on medical conditions in Israel and new developments at Shaare Zedek by Prof. Jonathan Halevy, Shaare Zedek's director general; Dr. Rachel Adatto-Levy, deputy medical director; Dr. Uzi Beller, director of the Division of Gynecological Surgery and Oncology; and Prof. Arthur Eidelman, head of the Neonatology Department.

Other Canadian participants at the conference included Bernie Abrams, national president of the Canadian Shaare Zedek Hospital Foundation, who chaired one of the sessions; Judy Feld-Carr, featured speaker at one of the luncheons; Sheila Dropkin, national executive director of the Canadian foundation, and her husband Arthur; and Dr. Leonard Makawka, a Toronto native, graduate of the University of Toronto, who is now head of the Comprehensive Liver Disease and Treatment Centre at St. Vincent Medical Centre, Los Angeles.

Shaare Zedek will be hosting an International Symposium on the Genetics of Breast and Ovarian Cancer in Jerusalem on June 9. Dr. Mary-Claire King of the University of Washington, Seattle, will present the keynote address.

Additional information on Shaare Zedek may be obtained from its Web site, [http://www.szmc.org.il] or by calling 416-781-3584 or 1-800-387-3595.

Tri-lateral program launched

JERUSALEM – Dr. Arnold Noyek, executive director of the Isabel Silverman Canada International Scientific Exchange Program (CISEPO) and Otolaryngologist-in-Chief at Mount Sinai Hospital, has announced plans for a CISEPO Canada-Israel-Palestinian Authority medical and health services program.

The CISEPO program will establish a tri-lateral, collaborative relationship among the medical communities of Canada, Israel and the Palestinian Authority.

The CISEPO Canada-Israel-Palestinian Authority program will involve five projects: volunteer medical services, continuing medical education, fellowships for peace, visiting professors for peace and evaluation and medical systems planning.

Noyek said the first project in the program was recently completed.

The workshop on hearing loss in Gaza, which was held at the Atfaluna Society for Deaf Children facilities in Gaza City, was planned and attended by audiologists, educators and medical specialists from the three participating jurisdictions.

JERUSALEM — Health-conscious Israelis can look forward this Passover to spreading the traditional charoset on organic matzah.

The Israeli Association for Organic Agriculture said it had invested some $33,000 to organize the marketing and distribution of the matzah, as well as other kosher-for-Passover goods, including organic baby food and organic grape juice.

Association officials said the price of the unleavened bread made from wheat that was not treated with any chemical fertilizers would be about 30 percent more than regular matzah.

Artist exposes the richness of life's experience

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — It's a leap from a master's degree in political science and economics to painting, but the joy in Ethel Harris' premiere exhibition, Water and Sky, attests to the success of the transition.

There was another major departure along the way when Harris earned her master's degree in English language and literature. In 1990, she published The King and the Flea and Other Folk Tales, a collection of Jewish folk stories, and in 1994, A Rage of Poppies, a book of poems for which she also designed the cover.

As a child she yearned to draw but was discouraged because it was considered a waste of time. Just four years ago when she was in her early 60s, a friend recommended an art instructor, Jim Thornton, who understood and fostered her long-submerged dream.

She studied drawing and in time, began to discover the possibilities of oils. "Once I got into paint, I was totally hooked," she declares, adding, "It's my metier, my life!"

It has become, she says, a way of seeing the world new and alive as she did in childhood and at the same time, bringing to her vision all the richness of life's experience.

Despite the exhilaration, Harris concedes that painting is an ongoing struggle. "You have to grow, take risks." And she does, always experimenting with color and light.

Many of her works are expansive — sweeping stretches of sky and water.

There is a dichotomy, not so much in subject matter, as in site.

She expresses what she knows and feels, both in Florida and at the family's lakeside cottage north of Huntsville. But in her Florida sunsets and sunrises, the waters, the clouds above, are warm oranges, brilliant purples, yellows. In Muskoka, the sun may set or rise in a cool sky over blue-green waters. The elements are the same but the sense is different.

Harris has a sureness, a confidence, which enables her to reproduce small studies on large canvases with considerable facility. She also makes her own monoprints, but she paints entirely in oils.

As well as the lofty skies and wide waters, she focuses on the more intimate scene, lilies afloat. Two large canvases placed side by side in the gallery, offer a telling contrast. One, a lily pond in a Florida public garden, is all stillness and serenity. The other, a drift of lily pads on a Muskoka lake, is restless motion.

The show runs until April 24, Tuesday to Saturday 10 a.m. to 6 p.m., Sunday 12 to 5, at the Rebecca Gallery, 317 Grace St., north-east corner of Harbord. Telephone 416-537-8213.

Play ruins chance to shatter hospital myths

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO —Some day a good play will be written about a hospital not being a good place to go to when you are sick, but Arrhythmia & Blues, by Toronto writer Howard Wiseman is not it.

It's true that in the play's hospital a patient is misdiagnosed, another gets the wrong medicine and a hypochondriac ties the staff up in knots. But this devastation is not held together by a credible story line and an opportunity to shatter some hospital myths goes awry.

This is a pity because, at times, Arrhythmia & Blues does come close to showing how people can get hurt by the medical and hospital system. "It took the magic of life out of me," says Mel (Andrew Massingham) discussing his treatment by a psychiatrist. At another point he tells Dr. Margolis (Catherine Hayos) that "You may listen, but you don't hear."

Unfortunately, Wiseman pins his story on a TV sitcom writer (played by Rena Polley) and in doing so parts company with real people. What is it about young playwrights that makes them think we only want to hear about beautiful people and the jet set?

Though the play does capture some of the Russian roulette that goes on in hospitals and the way patients get lost in the shuffle, the characters are not real flesh and blood and it is impossible to identify with them.

Obviously the production team gave a lot of thought to what goes on in hospitals (the sound of a murmur in a heart patient is beautifully reproduced) but director Jim Warren's frenetic moving to and fro of hospital curtains impedes, not clarifies, the story line, or whatever there is of it.

It runs at the Theatre Centre, Queen Street West, near Ossington Avenue, until April 20.

TO PETRA AND BEYOND

PETRA — Journeying from Damascus to Cairo in 1812, the Swiss explorer Burckhardt began to hear tales from his guide of an extraordinary city of stone hidden in the mountains near the town of Wadi Musa in what is now southern Jordan. Desirous of seeing these ruins, of which the local Arabs were highly protective, he devised a clever ruse.

By saying he wanted to slaughter a goat in honor of Haroun, the biblical Aaron whose alleged tomb was nearby, Burckhardt was permitted passage through the serpentine canyon known as the Siq into Petra.

A view of the treasury in Petra.

Previously, all knowledge of this "rose-red" city and its thousands of rock-hewn obelisks, tombs and dwellings had been lost to the Western world since the time of the Crusades.

A decade ago, Petra drew an average of 100 visitors per day. Now it receives ten times that number: more than a third of a million last year.

The Jordanians have built much-needed tourist facilities and enacted protective ecological measures to handle the increase in visitors.

Israelis in particular have long been fascinated by Petra. Before the Israeli-Jordanian peace, some even risked their lives by sneaking to the once-forbidden city across the once-closed border. Last year, more than 100,000 Israelis breezed across the Eilat-Aqaba border to Petra, some staying in Jordan only one day.

What is it about this ancient Nabatean city that, like the pyramids, works so fervently on the imagination? G. Lankester Harding, one-time director of the Jordanian Department of Antiquities, said it best in his classic The Antiquities of Jordan (1959): "Petra is everything that the travel agencies write about — except rose red; mostly the sandstone is of a dark red ochre shade, with fantastic bandings of yellow, grey and white in some places. The only part which could be called rose red is the Khaznah area; and I know nothing to equal the first sight of this huge rock-cut facade glowing in brilliant sunlight after one emerges from the darkness of the great cleft which leads into the city.

"I have visited Petra very many times now, but always that first, breath-taking vision remains in my mind; nor does familiarity breed contempt here, for at every visit one has to rein up the horse or stop in one's tracks and gaze astonished... (at) the glowing brilliance of the rock."

Indeed, Petra glows so brilliantly in the touristic imagination that, for many, it outshines Jordan's other archeological sites, of which there are multitudes. The Department of Antiquities is presently conducting a survey of them, according to Dr. Khairieh Amr, a senior archeologist.

"Right now we have about 20,000 registered sites, but we expect the final number to be between 100,000 and 500,000," she said.

Situated at Petra's back door, the town of Wadi Musa is one of the spots where, supposedly, Moses struck the rock and water gushed forth; the name means Valley of Moses. "We discovered 87 archeological sites in the region of Wadi Musa alone," Amr said. "We've been trying for a long time to tell people that Petra is not an archeological island. There are a lot of archeological sites in the surrounding area. Even archeologists go into Petra and see only Petra."

Visitors who spend more than a day or two in Jordan will be amply rewarded by the profusion of memorable sites. They include Jerash and Pella, spectacular ex-Roman towns in the north; Amman, the bustling capital with 1.5 million people; Madaba, the Dead Sea-region village with its famous 6th-century mosaic of Jerusalem; and Wadi Rum, where visitors trek past sandstone mountains to watch spectacular desert sunsets.

Then there's Aqaba, the historic Red Sea port city whose shuks contain many bargains; Kerak, one of several massive Crusader forts; Qasr al-Azraq, one of numerous desert castles lying in picturesque ruin; and Mt. Nebo, the panoramic lookout over the Jordan Valley from which Moses supposedly glimpsed the Promised Land. On clear mornings, the towers and domes of Jerusalem are visible on the distant diaphanous horizon. It's a poignant and beguiling view.

Bill Gladstone recently traveled to Jordan and Israel at the invitation of the tourism ministries of both countries. He flew Toronto to Amman via Royal Jordanian and returned from Tel Aviv via Air Canada.

Howard Johnson going to Israel

By HAIM SHAPIRO
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

The Howard Johnson hotel chain, is coming to Israel.

The US chain is expected to announce an agreement with the Israel Lands Development Corporation(ILDC) to hold the franchise for the Palestinian Authority, Greece, Turkey and Cyprus. ILDC has four hotels organized as the Israel Resort Hotels (IRH) chain, which are apparently going to become part of the Howard Johnson network.

Here to sign the agreement is Eric Pfeffer, president of HFS, the New Jersey-based holding company which includes, in addition to Howard Johnson, the Days Inn, Ramada and Park Inn chains. HFS last year had an annual turnover of $800 million (US), generated from some 4,200 hotels in dozens of countries.

The two companies are also expected to announce the results of negotiations with additional three- and four-star hotels in Israel and elsewhere in the region. Under the Howard Johnson framework, IRH intends to expand to seven hotels and 1,500 rooms by the end of next year.

Centre Spotlight a venue for diverse Jewish performers

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Susan Jackson has a promising career as a stand up comic if she ever decides to give up her day job as the director of continuity at UJA-Federation of Greater Toronto.

Jackson recently emceed a Celebration of Jewish Women's Talent at Centre Spotlight, a showcase for Yiddish and Jewish performers.

Actress Gloria Valentine is the artistic director of this cabaret-style show held monthly at the Winchevsksy Centre.

Centre Spotlight's celebration of women's talent in honor of International Women's Day drew a multi-generational audience of 130 people, filling the auditorium to capacity.

Performers included Yiddish translator Hindy Nosek-Abelson, folk trio Marcia Beck and Friends Lisa, actor Eva Lang, writer Dorothy Lichtblau, singer Lenka Lichtenberg, soprano Honey Novick, dancer Shula Saltsman, poet Libby Scheier and ventriloquist Judy Shier.

All the performers donated their time for this event, co-sponsored by the Morris Winchevsky School and Jewish Artists Scholarship Society (JASS), a non-profit organization dedicated to supporting and nurturing the Jewish and Yiddish performing arts.

Centre Spotlight is the brainchild of Valentine, a local actress/singer who performs in Yiddish and English. The founding president of JASS, Valentine perceived a need to showcase Jewish artists.

In the mid-'80s, she became interested in promoting Yiddish, a language she spoke as a child and she was one of the co-founders of Friends of Yiddish (FOY).

Valentine met Sol Hermolin through FOY a year ago and with his help, she made her dream of a venue for Jewish performers a reality.

Hermolin, owner of Lasting Impressions One-Hour Photo in the Bathurst Manor Plaza, grew up speaking Yiddish. Although his mother was fluent in English, she only spoke to him in Yiddish, he said.

"She didn't want me forget the mameloshen."

After his mother's death 11 years ago, Hermolin found that he hungered for Yiddishkeit and started a attending Yiddish concerts.

He said he also wanted to make a contribution to promoting Yiddish performances, so he volunteered to sell tickets.

Now a quasi-Yiddish Ticket Master – he jokingly calls himself the billetmeister – Lasting Impressions is a meeting place for many supporters of Yiddish, he added.

Hermolin recently joined the board of JASS, and when Valentine expressed the need for a stage, he directed her to the United Jewish People's Order (UJPO).

The shidduch between UJPO and JASS has turned out to be a perfect match: UJPO, long committed to Yiddishkeit, has an auditorium and JASS provides the performers.

Valentine is also the proud owner of a spotlight; hence the name Centre Spotlight.

The cabaret showcases a range of artists of varying ages, Valentine said. "The idea is for people to come out see these talented artists and hire them for their functions."

For more information, contact Valentine at 416-638-2222. The next show is April 12.

Finding love at the push of a button

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to the CJN

TORONTO — The Jewish Single's Registry's new cyber-dating system would shock Yenta the matchmaker.

Jewish matchmaking has come a long way since the shadchan made the introductions. These days, all one has to do is press a button to find one's bashert. Just click onto a file, read the bio, check out the picture (in that order of course), and if the person is not to your liking, keep clicking. Welcome to the introductory service of the cyber age.

Rob Singer, owner and operator of the Jewish Singles Registry, says the computerized system developed especially for his company is a state-of-the art program, complete with photographs and bios of over 1,200 clients who subscribe to the service.

The new system is user-friendly and gives Jewish singles an easy way of meeting each other, he says.

"You're not necessarily going to find your significant other, but it puts you into contact with many other Jewish singles. The format makes it easy to connect."

So how does it work? In the privacy of individual offices, clients search for dates by clicking through computer files categorized by age and gender. Each file has a code number, as last names, addresses and phone numbers are not provided.

After a client picks a potential date, the registry staff contacts the person chosen, who then books a time — usually within a day or so— to check out the other person's file before authorizing the exchange of phone numbers.

While the registry may not necessarily lead to matrimony — Singer claims it produces a marriage every six weeks — the service does guarantee a minimum of 10 dates. The annual fee of $295 plus GST includes unlimited access to the computer and an unlimited number of dates. People can use the service for free after a year until they reach their 10-date minimum.

The computer eliminates the need for a matchmaker. "People know what they're looking for. The Jewish Single's Registry lets them choose for themselves."

One thing hasn't changed since Yenta's time: The women still have to wait for the men to make the first move.

"The man initiates contact. Most women still prefer the old fashioned way— being called by a man."

Singer wants people to check out how easy his system is. He's holding an open house April 13 from 1 to 4 p.m. at their new headquarters, 55 Eglinton Ave. E., suite 405.

At The Israel Museum

Seventy works by the Odessa-born goldsmith Israel Rouchomovsky (1860-1934) are currently on view at the Israel Museum in Jerusalem. One of the items, a gold tiara, has an extraordinary provenance, for experts at the Louvre Museum in Paris misidentified it as a Scythian-Greek artifact from the third century BCE and presented it as such before the public in 1896.

Although some archeologists immediately expressed doubts, they were sharply rebuked by the "tiarists," and the piece remained on display for seven years. It was declared a fake only in 1903 after Rouchomovsky himself came to Paris and declared before a specially appointed parliamentary committee that he was the maker.

Besides the tiara, other displayed items crafted by Rouchomovsky include jewelry, medallions, Judaica, miniature books in gold and enamel, and a miniature gold human skeleton kept in a tiny sarcophagus. Until Aug. 25.

Gritty Lumet film still strikes a resonant note

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Sidney Lumet

Thirty-two years after its release, Sidney Lumet's The Pawnbroker still strikes a resonant note. If you were impressed by it the first time around, you surely will be again when it is screened on TVOntario on April 26 at 8 p.m.

This gritty black-and-white film, starring the irrepressible Rod Steiger as a German Jewish Holocaust survivor who's no longer in touch with his emotions, certainly leaves an impression.

It is strong but not maudlin, well-paced and masterfully directed. Quincy Jones' tingling jazz score hits the mark, heightening the tensions which permeate this sometimes riveting two-hour movie.

Steiger portrays Sol Nazerman, the gloomy proprietor of a Harlem pawn shop. He is tough, cynical and drives a hard bargain. "Two dollars," he perpetually intones in a dead voice as he names his bargain basement price for this or that item some poor soul wishes to sell off.

It is not difficult to understand why Nazerman is so unfeeling toward his external environment. His world view has been shaped by the Holocaust, which devoured his winsome wife and two lovely children, as well as his optimism.

Now married to his late wife's sister and living in a dreary suburban sub-division of New York City, Nazerman remains a hostage of his bitter wartime experiences. He is constantly assailed by bitter-sweet flashbacks of his former life and of the concentration camp which humiliated and nearly killed him.

The Pawnbroker unfolds in a succession of scenes which define Nazerman and flesh out his relationship with the following characters: his boisterous Puerto Rican assistant whose ambitions are bigger than his reach, a menacing Afro-American gangster whose corruptive influence he tries to ward off and a lonely white woman who seeks his company. She is played with admirable restraint by Geraldine Fitzgerald.

For all intents and purposes, the film is dominated by Steiger, whose acting abilities reach an apotheosis here. In a succession of beautifully articulated vignettes accented by moody closeups, Steiger launches into belabored ruminations which shed light on the telltale tattooed numbers on his arm and amplify the so-called fabled business acumen of Jews throughout the ages. In one instance, he parries a vicious anti-Semitic epithet flung at him by a disgruntled customer.

As befits the topic, The Pawnbroker is unremittingly bleak. But it is also a poignant portrait of a man who has been crushed by the relentless weight of the Holocaust.

The Pawnbroker is followed by Crossfire, one of the first Hollywood films which addressed the issue of anti-Semitism in America. The 1947 film stars Robert Young and Robert Mitchum, and is worth seeing.

Desert city still a thriving hot-spot of tourism

By JEFF ROSEN
News Editor

LAS VEGAS — A sphinx and pyramid welcome travellers, and pirates, magicians and Roman warriors await your arrival.

Although Las Vegas today may sound like something out of a fairy tale, this former dusty watering hole is actually one of the hottest meccas for tourists and residents alike.

The city's eleborate image, however, conceals its humble beginning. Las Vegas got its start in the 1850s when the Mormon church sent a mission of 30 men to construct a fort and teach agriculture to the Indians. It became a city in 1905 when the railroad announced this city was to be a major division point.

Prior to legalized gambling in 1931, Las Vegas was developing as an agricultural area. Its fame as a resort area became prominent after World War II when the first hotel opened on U.S. Highway 91 — now known as the "Strip" — in April 1941.

Today, that same strip is 3½ miles long.

From a quiet backwater, Las Vegas today has developed into the fastest growing metropolitan area in the United States, with a combined population of over one million in the Las Vegas Valley. With approximately 4,000 people a year relocating to the area, the construction and manufacturing industries continue to thrive. Construction cranes dot the famous landscape, adding new suburban communities and gambling resorts.

The new unique entertainment palaces are proving as much a tourist draw as the casinos located within them. Last year, Las Vegas drew nearly 30 million visitors and estimates show it will exceed that number this year.

Part of the credit no doubt goes to the "boys" behind Las Vegas, who have come to realize that they can no longer sell the town on gambling and glitz alone. Gone are the days when hotels bearing names which played on the area's landscape — the Dunes, Sahara, Sands and Desert Inn — counted on major stars to draw the public.

As a result several new hotels/casinos/resorts/tourist-attractions have opened recently. Each has a different theme, and each offers more than simply gambling. Where else could one start the day with a tour of a pyramid, head off to New York, go on to King Arthur's court and end the day in the company of Caribbean pirates?

Among the newer entertainment palaces is the Luxor, shaped like an Egyptian pyramid with a Sphinx in front of the casino. Hieroglyphics are the rage here and the elevators run at a 39-degree angle to reach the rooms, which are arranged along the outside of the hotel. At night, the strongest light beam in the world shoots upwards into the desert sky. Even some of the souvenirs here are imported from Egypt.

At the largest hotel in the world (for now), the MGM lion welcomes guests to the 5,000-room-plus MGM Grand. Once inside, follow the yellow brick road to a replica of Emerald City. In the back is a full-fledged theme park with sections modelled on New York, an Asian Village and Olde England.

If the British isle really strikes your fancy, head over to the Excalibur, the third-largest hotel in the world. Here, Merlin the magician battles it out with fire-breathing dragons in the moat, while knights and jesters roam the casino in medieval garb.

Next door, just spanking new, is New York, New York (if you can make it here, you can make it anywhere). This 2,035-room resort, which opened this year, is modelled on the New York skyline and, at 48 storeys, is the tallest hotel/casino in Las Vegas. Among its 12 buildings, is a 48-storey, 525-foot-high version of the Empire State Building, a 42-storey Chrysler Building and a 26-storey AT&T Building. Besides the impressive structures is a 300-foot-long replica of the Brooklyn Bridge and 200-foot-tall Coney Island-style roller coaster and a 150-foot-tall Statue of Liberty.

At the Treasure Island, which opened a few years ago, the theme is pirates and even the most diehard landlubber finds it hard not to get caught up in the spectacle, watching Caribbean pirates do battle with British frigates. The hotel is the home of the world-renowned circus troupe, Cirque du Soleil.

Just steps from Long John Silver's home, is the Mirage, fronted by a huge volcano which erupts every 15 minutes after dark, shooting flames into the desert sky. An aquarium holds sharks in the lobby and elsewhere are habitats for rare white tigers and dolphins.

Of course, the granddaddy of all hotel experiences is Caesar's Palace. From the statue of Caesar hailing a cab at the entrance, through the World of Caesar, a miniature Roman city, to the costumed gladiators and exclusive shops, this was the original resort that started the spectacle of one-upmanship. The Forum Shoppes are fun to visit, even if you don't want to spend any money (you can save that for the casinos). Special effects have succeeded in making the place feel like an ancient Roman street complete with arches and pillars and, marbled walkways.

For those who seek some religious comfort (as opposed to praying at the black jack tables) Las Vegas has a sizable Jewish community, boasting two Conservative synagogues, two Orthodox, one Recontructionist, two Reform, two traditional and one independent. As well, the city has its own federation, Jewish community centre and social service agency.

331 IN MEMORIAM

Some of our readers will have heard of Israel FRENKIEL, teacher, polyglot, translator (of LESSING in particular), friend of MOHILIVER, PINSKER, mentioned in the Encyclopedia Judaica by Nachum SOKOLOV.

Israel FRENKIEL,who died prematurely in 1890,was known by reputation well beyond the limits of his native city(RADOM in Poland).It is on the occasion of the death of the following members of his family that we recall the memory of Israel FRENKIEL:

1) His granddaughter, Sarah KLAJNER-DIAMENT, died in Paris, Feb. 27, 1996, a medical doctor with the Faculté de PARIS,known as "MARTINE" in the Resistance. She concealed her underground fighting by working as a governess for General GAMELIN. At Liberation, as a lieutenant (doctor), she rejoined the first French Army of the Rhine and Danube in Germany, where she had the opportunity to see the slow death camps, particularly VAIHINGEN (Baden), and she miraculously met some family members and friends. Her husband, Israel KLAJNER, a native of PRZYSUCHA, volunteered when war was declared, was captured at the Franco-Swiss border and interned in a work camp in Switzerland. Upon returning to PARIS after Liberation, Dr. Sarah DIAMENT known as Salka, continued to practice medicine in military hospitals, then as a general practitioner-pediatrician, devoting herself to the children of concentration camp prisoners, then towards the end of her practice, to North African families.

2) Israel (known as Iziek) FRENKIEL, died June 24, 1996, in Australia, leaving his wife Nina (née MIGDALEK), two sons and their families. Thanks to the devotion of his wife, although he was ill, he was able to attend his grandson's bar mitzvah on June 15, 1996. Homage should be paid to Mrs. Nina FRENKIEL for the sacrifices she made.

3) Leon GUTMAN, died in Sweden, April 27, 1995, leaving his wife, Fredrika, Israel FRENKIEL's granddaughter, as well as his son and his son's family. He was a Hebrew scholar and chief accountant in a factory until his lengthy illness.He was the son of a tanner from RADOM.

Both Iziek FRENKIEL and Leon GUTMAN were liberated from VAIHINGEN concentration camp by Moroccan soldiers with the French Army of the Rhine and Danube, and they miraculously met Dr. Sarah (Salka) DIAMENT-KLAJNER there.

The memory of Israel FRENKIEL and his three grandchildren will now be perpetuated through family and friends in several countries.

Hoopsters help U of T to national tourney

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — From the Blue Demons to the Varsity Blues, Stephanie Splitter and Laura Verbetten have come a long way in the world of competitive women's basketball.

The two teammates with the University of Toronto Blues were only two games away from the Canadian championship as top colleges vied for national bragging rights. One of two Ontario teams to advance to the CIAU's version of March Madness, the Blues were upset 64-60 in the semi-finals by crosstown rivals York Yeowomen.

The Blues had defeated the Yeowomen in three regular season matchups en route to an 18-2 record and the number two ranking in Canada behind Western.

Perhaps they were a little over confident, maybe they were looking ahead to the final, but the Blues were devastated by the loss, said Blues coach, Michele Belanger.

In the championship game, York, with Dena Weinroth in the lineup, lost to a powerhouse team from the University of Manitoba that Belanger said was clearly the class of the tournament.

Although they were on opposite sides of the court in the playoffs, Splitter, Verbetten and Weinroth were all teammates with the Jewish Community Centre Blue Demons four years ago. Verbetten and Splitter credited the years they spent with the Blue Demons as providing a valuable springboard for their later success.

Verbetten, 18, and Splitter, 20, played key roles in the U of T's playoff run as well as in the team's regular season success. Verbetten, a rookie guard, and Splitter, a forward, were first off the bench and both got lots of playing time, Belanger said.

A slender six-footer, Verbetten was one of the Blues' leaders, finishing second in team scoring with 11.9 points per game, fourth in rebounds with 4.5 per game, first in team steals and sixth in steals in the conference. She shot 35 per cent on her three-pointers and 42 per cent from the field. Capping off a remarkable season, Verbetten was named rookie of the year in the Ontario Women's Intercollegiate Athletic Association (OWIAA) east division and made the all-Canadian rookie team as well.

Splitter, a six-footer playing her second year of college ball, was second in field goal percentage for the Blues with a 50 per cent mark. With a limited role in the Blues offensive scheme, Splitter averaged 5.3 points per game but she helped the team by nabbing 4.7 rebounds per game.

Both players performed well in the championship tournament in Thunder Bay, Belanger said. "Stephanie picked up her game and played pretty consistently." Verbetten played well too but her youth and inexperience were also evident as she made some rookie mistakes, Belanger added.

Their former coach with the Blue Demons, Sy Herling, followed their progress through the playoffs and was proud — though not surprised — at the way their performed.

"They were both good athletes," he recalled. Even though both were "raw" talents when they came to the Blue Demons, "we instilled a good work ethic" and the girls dedicated themselves to improving their games. During the summers they played loads of hoops and developed their skills.

Herling "gave me the opportunity to play. He was very patient and very supportive," Verbetten said.

"He made me," Splitter said. "He gave me the skills and expected me to practice them over and over."

Verbetten played three years with the Blue Demons, Splitter two. Along with Weinroth, they were member of the 1993 team that represented Toronto at the JCC Maccabi Youth Games in Pittsburgh. That squad, afraid of being embarrassed by U.S. hoops squads, worked hard all summer to make sure they'd show well in Pittsburgh, Herling said.

In the end, they were "awesome," limiting their opponents to less than 10 points a game. Their hosts, Pittsburgh finally racked up double figures, but not until the championship final when they were shellacked by Toronto, 63-18. Six of the 10 members of that team went on to play college ball. One, Karen Shaw, played for McGill this past season.

Herling, along with a group of volunteers, is hoping the young women reprise their championship performance at his summer's Maccabiah Games in Israel. The personnel is there to field a competitive team, he believes.

In addition to Verbetten, Weinroth, Shaw and Splitter, Herling points to Eva Ain, who will probably play for Ryerson next year, Robyn Lerer, who played for McMaster several years ago, Michelle Sund, a onetime OWIAA all-star at York and Heather Kurtz, who was an all-star at Brock a few years ago, as potential members of the team.

While the talent is there, funding is not and so the volunteers have been attempting to raise the $50,000 needed to send the women to Israel.

Anyone interested in supporting the venture can contact Herling at 905-731-0442 or 505-9962.

The Inside Back

The internal fences that divide us

By DAVID NEWMAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

Comment

When I checked my e-mail messages, I found one from a neighbor forwarding an article she had downloaded from another list. It was about a lecture which was to have taken place at the Hebrew University last week.

Left-wing students and faculty demonstrated violently against the presence of journalist Barry Chamish, who had planned to lecture on a "conspiracy" behind the assassination of Yitzhak Rabin.

The writer of the article, who had gone to hear the lecture, claimed in it that she feared for her safety, even her life.

Prior to forwarding it, my neighbor commented cynically that this was just the kind of behavior that might be expected from the "so-called liberals" I mix with.

With a foot firmly planted in a number of different worlds, let me try and compare the types of message and levels of tolerance I hear respectively from the religious world of the synagogues, yeshivot hesder and religious schools that I sometimes attend and in which my children and neighbors study, and those of the universities and Tel Aviv cafes in which my professional and research contacts take place, and to which I am becoming increasingly attached at the expense of the former.

Each world displays an equal amount of intolerance for the other; each perceives the other as a threat to the existence of its own culture, social norms and ways of behavior.

True, the liberal left allows for broader debate and more questions than does the black and white world of the nationalist right; but it does not necessarily follow that it is any more tolerant.

Israel's society has become increasingly heterogeneous and segregated. Each of its constituent groups believes that it and it only has the answers to political and social problems.

The national melting pot, an idea created in the 1950s by secular, strongly Zionist groups which conceived of themselves in much the same way as the national-religious perceive themselves today — namely as the ideological flag-bearers of Zionist Israel to the exclusion of all other beliefs — is finally showing itself for the myth it is.

Orthodox and secular don't understand the first thing about each other's beliefs. Each self-righteously describes the other as "lacking values" (the secular left) or "medieval" (the religious right).

As Israel's first 50 years draw to a close, post-Zionists of the secular left are locked in a struggle with neo-Zionists of the national religious camp over promoting their own, single-minded versions of ideological hegemony over state and society.

Our political parties have become increasingly segregated along ethnic and religious lines. Our school systems remain separate and our army units are becoming increasingly ideological.

We have created internal fences and boundaries separating us from each other. The division starts at age five and, in some cases, doesn't finish till we are six feet under.

And we raise our eyes to the heavens in surprise that — what?! — we cannot talk to each other, don't understand each other's values, and have, in short, created two, or even three, separate societies in one small country.

Ignorant of other sub-Israeli and Jewish cultures and unable to talk in their language, we display our intolerance by refusing even to attempt meaningful dialogue. It's far easier to be dismissive.

During our half-century of existence as a state, we have used the threat of external and existential threat to wallpaper over the cracks of internal heterogeneity. It is, paradoxically, simpler to live with the discourse of conflict and existential threat. We are always united in face of war, terrorist outrage or act of violence perpetrated against the state.

The removal of the conflict poses a new and difficult agenda. Many reject conflict resolution (call it a peace process if you will) because they do not know how to create an identity outside the discourse of "anti-Semitism" and "the whole world hates us."

Many of us are unable — or unwilling — to raise problematic issues like how the state should function on behalf of all of its citizens, Jewish and Arab, Zionist, non-Zionist and even anti-Zionist, secular and Orthodox.

In an effort to become just that bit more tolerant, to become a listening as well as a talking society, we need to dismantle many of those internal ideological fences. This means a single educational system and the end of ideological army units, and it is the real challenge facing the state today.

For without some new modus vivendi of "live and let live," one in which no one group attempts to impose its own ideological hegemony, we will eat ourselves up from within quite efficiently without any help from outside.

The writer is professor of political geography and director of the Humphrey Institute for Social Research at Ben-Gurion University.

About jobs

Dear Lisa,

Is there anything I can do to make my cover letter and resume get noticed?

Dear Reader,

First of all, read and reread your cover letter and resume to check for spelling, typographical and grammatical errors. These papers are often the first impression you make.

Your cover letter and resume must look neat and clean with no white-out or words crossed out. If you can't produce high-quality professional-looking papers, ask someone else to prepare them for you. Learn how to copy that style yourself.

Look in a book that has sample resumes and cover letters or visit a career counsellor.

Human Resource Managers do not pay more attention to materials printed on fancy papers. They like to see legible usually word-processed letters and resumes but generally do not care if the envelope is hand-written. They also do not really care – unless there is a specific request – if your information arrives by mail, courier, fax or e-mail so long as it arrives by the appropriate deadline. One note of caution, however, if you are planning on sending information via e-mail ensure your file design will match with the applications available wherever the download will happen or your information may not print out.

Human Resource Managers generally look to match the skills and experience of the candidate with the job requirements. They assume the person applying for the job has seen this list of job requirements, which is usually printed in the form of and advertisement or job posting. For that reason, they prefer to see simple cover letters that briefly introduce the candidate and why he or she is sending in a resume.

Resumes are commonly one to two pages and they are easier to read if they are designed in a simple format. Your skills and experience will be the one thing that really captures the attention of the Human Resources Manager, so make sure they are easy for her to find and read. Listing your work experience first is most common. Since time is of the essence, point form comments highlighting a person's experience are sometimes easier to read than sentence form.

Anti-Jewish bias alleged, as CJC begins 'outing'

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Accusations of anti-Semitic bias in the federal government's war crimes unit coincided last week with Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) and U.S. private eye Steven Rambam's making good on their threat to begin "outing" suspected Nazi war criminals.

Addressing a public meeting in Montreal, Rambam named Josef Kisielaitis of Burlington, Ont., as an alleged former member of a Lithuanian army unit that murdered thousands of Jews during World War II.

Kisielaitis lives under his own name and "is happy as a clown," said Rambam, the high-profile New York investigator who says he obtained taped confessions of atrocities committed by dozens of war crimes suspects across Canada.

Rambam said he and Congress will "out" one or two alleged Nazi war criminals every week in an attempt to force the government to step up deportations.

CJC's Bernie Farber said the public naming of those who have not been charged is unusual, but "it's a sign of desperation, a sign of how frustrated we've become" with Ottawa's pace on prosecutions.

Also last week, the Justice Department said it may launch a formal investigation into allegations of anti-Jewish bias in the war crimes unit.

Justice Minister Allan Rock was not available for comment.

But his communications assistant, Jennifer Lang, told The CJN Monday morning that Rock "will sit down with his deputy minister, George Thomson, and will review closely the chronology of events to ensure the issue was dealt with properly."

She said Rock "wouldn't rule out a formal investigation" if he "deems it necessary."

It was a standard response to concern expressed by Jewish groups over reports that anti-Semitic bias in the department's war crimes unit may have hindered the prosecution of suspected Nazi war criminals.

In published reports last week, William Hobson, who headed the war crimes unit from 1987 to 1990, charged that Justice Department lawyer Arnold Fradkin's objectivity and legal advice were considered suspect because he is Jewish.

Fradkin was the only Jew

Passover's heroism

The purpose of the Passover seder is the retelling, and, one might even say, the "re-enacting" of the exodus from Egypt.

The exodus is the seminal event of Jewish history, the binding seam of our peoplehood, woven into our collective memory by almost four millennia of recollection and recitation.

Editorial

We are all familiar with the impenetrably powerful story. "With an outstretched arm and a mighty hand," God vanquished Pharaoh and freed the slaves so that they might live free, governed by law, not tyranny, to lead moral, "holy", purposeful lives.

The Haggadah is carefully crafted. We tell the story of yitzi-at Mitzrayim with only one "hero" on its pages: God. The large, dramatic, sweeping acts of heroism are performed only by God. The "ordinary" acts of the exodus are performed by His people, the children of Israel.

In this "division of labor," between God and us, it seems we find, as ever, a deeper truth.

Most of us never get to perform single, sweeping acts of dramatic, larger-than-life heroism. In movies it happens a great deal; in real life, considerably less so.

However, that does not mean we lack for the opportunity to be heroic, if not exactly "heroes."

Rather, our heroism is to be found in the smaller, more prosaic, but vital assertions of everyday human struggles: in the parent's word fittingly spoken to his child, in the kindness one friend confers on another, or in the cool, smooth touch of a caring hand upon a patient's fevered brow.

Thus, in recounting the force and the sheer breathtaking magnitude of God's heroism, the Haggadah invites us to speculate upon our own heroism as well.

In our case, though, it shouldn't take a miracle.

Holocaust Videos

MONTREAL — Voices of Survival, a film that interviews seven Holocaust survivors, and its accompanying education guide were recently distributed to over 550 senior high schools across the country by Canadian Jewish Congress.

The 60-minute video provides information on the background and aftermath of the Holocaust, as well as biographies of survivors.

Human Rights Hearing

VANCOUVER — A human rights hearing into the writings of North Shore News columnist Doug Collins is set for May 12.

Accused by Canadian Jewish Congress, Pacific region, of exposing the Jewish community to hatred in a newspaper column, Collins is getting support from individuals whose community he allegedly defamed.

ISRAEL

Poison on Israel's Shores

JERUSALEM — More than 400 bottles containing poisonous material washed up on Israel's shores last week.

Environment Ministry officials said they believe that the bottles fell off a boat that was transporting them and were blown toward Israel's coast by recent storms.

Levy Visits Turkey

JERUSALEM — Foreign Minister David Levy made a two-day visit to Turkey last week in an effort to strengthen ties with the predominantly Muslim country.

His visit came a week after the Turkish Parliament ratified a free-trade agreement with Israel, which goes into effect May 1.

B'Tselem Blasts Israel

JERUSALEM — The B'Tselem human rights organization last week accused the Israeli governments over the past 18 months of implementing a policy which takes away the right to live in Jerusalem from hundreds or thousands of Palestinians who were born there.

WORLD

Cemetery Desecrated

PRAGUE — Vandals destroyed 70 headstones last week at a cemetery in Kosice, in eastern Slovakia.

A memorial to the victims of the Holocaust was also damaged, as were the graves of former rabbis.

Rebecca Shulman

NEW YORK — Rebecca Shulman, a former national president of Hadassah, the Women's Zionist Organization of America, recently died at the age of 100.

Shulman served as president from 1953-56.

Nazi Propagandist Dies

NEW YORK — A New Jersey man who had worked as a propagandist during World War II in Nazi-allied Hungary has died, according to U.S. government sources.

Ferenc Koreh, against whom the United States had won a court order of deportation in January, was 87 years old and had suffered from a blood disorder.

The U.S. government had agreed at the time of the court order that it would not act to remove Koreh from the United States unless his rapidly deteriorating health improved. Koreh died April 1 after undergoing surgery, government sources said.

NON-JEWISH VICTIMS OVERLOOKED

Simon Wiesenthal, head of the Nazi documentation centre in Vienna, said recently that Jews had concentrated too much on the Jewish victims of Nazism, overlooking the millions of non-Jewish victims whose deaths strengthened the Jewish case for justice and restitution.

"We made a mistake in talking only of the six million Jewish victims," he said. "In doing that, we allowed the world to forget that there were also five million non-Jewish victims." The Nazi-hunter stated that as a result, "many gentiles now think of the Nazi murders" as only a Jewish matter.

SEPARATE HOLOCAUST SERVICE CHALLENGED

Canadian Jewish Congress leader Sydney M. Harris has called the decision of Toronto Orthodox groups to hold a separate Holocaust memorial observance "an act of singular disservice to the unity of the Jewish community."

Congress sponsored a community-wide Holocaust remembrance last Tuesday night at Beth Tzedec Synagogue to mark the 29th anniversary of the Warsaw Ghetto uprising. A night earlier, the Orthodox groups held a memorial service at Shaarei Tefillah Congregation.

Alleged war criminals getting pensions: Abella

'Veil of silence' over prosecutions

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Twenty alleged war criminals named by the Deschenes Commission are living abroad and collecting Canadian pensions, says Irving Abella, chair of Canadian Jewish Congress's (CJC) war crimes committee.

"These were 'slam dunk' cases who refused to go to court and instead left Canada," said Abella. "Why aren't they denaturalized?"

A "veil of silence" has been drawn over the prosecution of war criminals in Canada and even the budget and personnel of the war crimes unit is secret, Abella told 600 people at the Ontario Region plenary session.

Defending the CJC's use of an informant hot line, he said, "in 10 days we've been astonished at the quality and quantity of calls.

"We want to encourage the RCMP to use the information. They must become more aggressive."

William Hobson (left) former head of the Canadian Justice Department's War Crimes Unit, receives a certificate of appreciation from Irving Abella.

Abella acknowledged that Allan Rock, the federal minister of justice, has been the most "responsive" on the issue of any minister in any post World War II Canadian government.

He said William Hobson, former head of the war crimes unit, and Arnold Fradkin, a former unit lawyer, are "two heroes" of the Jewish community. "They won the only case we ever won on war criminals (deportation of Jacob Lutjens) despite obstacles thrown up against them both within and without the unit."

Before presenting Hobson with an award of merit from the CJC, Abella said: "Hobson was our strongest ally in the Department of Justice and has committed himself to the detriment of his own health. He is the only person in the history of the war crimes unit to publicly attack the government for its lack of zeal."

Award for Hobson

Accepting the award, Hobson said that then Minister of Justice (Kim Campbell) had been advised that a member of the unit (Arnold Fradkin) could not be objective because he was Jewish.

"Two of us have been forced out of the unit and others told not to consider our opinions on any war crimes cases."

Hobson said he had offered his services free to the government in the last week and was told he was not needed.

"I've had enough," Hobson told the plenary."Prior to my being forced out of the unit, senior bureaucrats phoned me and told me to stop making paper trails and to stop forwarding recommendations in which I said I was of the strong opinion that 'X' should be criminally prosecuted and 'Y' should be prosecuted by denaturalization proceeding. And the message went further to the effect that you are putting the minister (Campbell) in a corner as well as the bureaucrats in question."

The government's inaction was termed "disgraceful," by Steve Rambam, the investigator who interviewed alleged war criminals in Canada.

"You can sleep pretty soundly if you are a Nazi in Canada," said Rambam. "These people will all cheat the hangman."

Crisis on campuses

Two weeks ago, I wrote an " introductory" column about the critical importance of the college and university period in the development of our children's lives, and particularly so for their Jewish development.

Last week, using the "testimony" of Dr. Arthur Kruger, the president of the Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto (JCS), I attempted to show that the present level of Jewish support services for the 15,000 Jewish students attending college or university in the greater Toronto area is precariously inadequate to properly encourage and foster their Jewish development.

The term I used was "crisis." I did not simply use it for effect. I used it because I deeply believe the situation to be that desperate.

No Jewish student body in North America is funded as poorly or proportionately staffed as minimally as are the 15,000 students in the greater Toronto area.

And, perhaps saddest of all, for the first time in generations, the students at the U of T will have no Jewish centre at all after June 30, if no one steps forward, philanthropically or otherwise to help fund the space ostensibly earmarked for the U of T students in Whitney Hall.

A story by Michael Davis of the Baltimore Jewish Times that we carried in The CJN last week is a fitting springboard for this, the final column dealing with the crisis.

Writing about Hillel as the foundation for Jewish campus life, Davis said "I don't think we can overstate the importance of Hillel's role in Jewish continuity and identity... The mission of Hillel in the 1990s is to make the choice (of being Jewish) tempting to college kids."

In this, Davis wrote what countless others, including The CJN, have often written before.

But he also added a piece of information that adds a melancholy poignancy to the Toronto predicament. "Hillel's Jewish Campus Service Corps is thriving on major campuses and a $200 million endowment campaign is under way to rebuild aging Hillel facilities and erect new structures on campuses across the United States. (Our emphasis)

While comparisons between the two jurisdictions are inappropriate and for most purposes unproductive, this specific comparison does plant a marker into the soil of our failings in support of our college-age children on campus.

Many of those children have no inclination or curiosity toward Jewish explorations on campus, though others do. They are curious and we must help them to find that point of entry.

The relevance of such an entry point was movingly expressed in the recent editorial by Jessica Pelt, the editor of Images, the Jewish students' newspaper in greater Toronto, in the February issue of the newspaper. The following is an excerpt from that editorial.

"Our student years are formative ones. Many of us have figured out our lives, found our identities, in school. Others will continue their search, hoping to find their identities in the near future. It is during these years that we have, in some way, realized our Jewish identities.

"Some will grow, some will remain the same. Unfortunately, some will weaken. The crucial aspect is that even by reading Images, people have recognized their Jewish identities.

"As students, we have been actively lobbying the community as a whole to give us more resources and allow us more room to explore and examine our Judaism. And just as none of us would ever forget our education, so must we never forget our Judaism.

"As we continue our lives, we must give back to the community in whatever way, and through whatever involvement, we can." (Our emphasis)

These are the words of the next generation, words and sentiments we so fervently hope to find in our children. "So must we never forget our Judaism... we must give back to the community..."

What could be more precious?

What could be more important for us, their parents, their community, than to do everything within our abilities to allow them "more room to explore and examine our Judaism?"

This is not yet another call for the federation to "give more." Its budget simply cannot accommodate all the valid competing and pressing demands upon it for "more" and it would not be fair to the other financial urgencies within the community.

But it is, nevertheless, a call for help on behalf of those vital Jewish campus services.

In four days, after the stars have ascended into the sky, we will gather around the table to recite the Haggadah.

If we are lucky, we will be with our families.

And if we are luckier still, no-one will be missing.

For those of us who are parents, our older children, perhaps college -age, perhaps moved away, will have returned, even if temporarily, to be at our side. Undoubtedly, more than once through the storytelling of the evening, we will "sneak" long, loving looks at them, thankful to God for their place in our lives.

To give more meaning to those thankful feelings, let us resolve to do all we can to find for our campus children more resources to allow them "more room to explore and examine (their) Judaism."

That would please Jessica Pelt.

It should also please us all.

CIC seeks meet with Axworthy over Hezbollah

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) wants a meeting between Jewish community leaders and Foreign Affairs Minister Lloyd Axworthy to discuss reports that Hezbollah, the pro-Iranian extremist group that has taken credit for many attacks against Israeli targets, has a network in Canada.

The CIC has sent out letters to national Jewish agencies saying it "is in the process of organizing a meeting of Jewish community leaders" and Axworthy to discuss the situation.

The CIC's action stems from reports that Hezbollah has established an infrastructure in Canada "that can assist and support terrorists seeking a safe haven in North America.

"Hezbollah operatives receive and comply with direction from the Hezbollah leadership hierarchy in Lebanon," state court documents in the case of Hani Abdul Rahim Sayegh, who has admitted he was once a member of the Saudi Hezbollah and who faces deportation from Canada.

Sayegh, 28, arrived in Canada last August and applied for refugee status. He was arrested in March under suspicion of belonging to a "terrorist" group, and currently sits in a maximum security detention centre in Ottawa awaiting his April 28 deportation hearing.

He'll have to answer charges that he participated in the June, 1996 truck bombing of U.S. military headquarters in Dharan, Saudi Arabia, in which 19 American servicemen were killed and a further 384 wounded.

Sayegh has denied the charge and says he had a falling out with the Saudi Hezbollah, a radical Shiite movement whose activities are supported by the Lebanese Hezbollah. But he's admitted to withholding information from Canadian authorities when he made his refugee claim.

Both the United States and Saudi Arabia are seeking Sayegh's extradition.

Claims that Sayegh was a major player in the Dharan bombing, and claims that Hezbollah has established an infrastructure in Canada, are contained in documents submitted to the Federal Court of Canada by the Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS).

At a closed-door hearing this month, a Federal Court judge ruled that only a 300-page summary of the CSIS findings would be made public, as releasing more "would be injurious to national security or to the safety of persons."

CSIS claims that Sayegh was "the mastermind" behind the bombing, having conducted surveillance of the military installation. It says that on the day of the bombing, he drove the car that signalled a truck carrying the 1,000 pounds of explosives. About five minutes later, the truck exploded inside the compound.

CSIS says Sayegh's presence in Canada "assists in promoting the terrorist aims of Saudi Hezbollah in that he is in position to support, facilitate or effect reprisals in Canada, the United States and elsewhere."

Charges that Hezbollah has set up a base of operations in this country has Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) worried.

"Given the fact that [CSIS] has confirmed this information, it is difficult to comprehend why Canada does not undertake more aggressive measures," stated Les Scheininger, chair of CJC's international affairs committee. Scheininger says Canada should support a U.S. law that imposes sanctions on foreign companies which invest in countries such as Iran and Libya.

Congress has other questions too. A year ago, in an interview with CJC officials, Axworthy said Ottawa would review its relations with Tehran. The minister stressed, however, that there is "a fairly strong sense" that Canada should maintain "some degree of engagement" with Iran to keep channels open.

Congress says it has heard nothing since.

According to a Foreign Affairs spokesperson, Canada expressed concern to Iran over the latter's support of terrorist groups abroad as recently as last November.

Canada's new concern over Iran's sponsorship of groups such as Hezbollah and Hamas resulted from the review Axworthy had promised, Rodney Moore told The CJN.

Moore could not say what the Iranian response was to Canada's concerns.

The Sayegh case is not the first time accusations have arisen that Hezbollah has infiltrated Canada. In early 1994, the Federal Court upheld the deportation of a confessed Hezbollah member, who admitted the organization has an arm in this country.

Queries submitted to Gray

At the time, CJC called on the federal solicitor general to probe the presence, strength and activities of Hezbollah in Canada.

Last week, The CJN requested a telephone interview with Solicitor General Herb Gray to discuss the Jewish community's concerns about Hezbollah's presence in this country.

Gray's media assistant, Dan Brien, requested that questions be put in writing, and said he would forward them to Gray. These were the questions:

- Does Canada plan to ask Iran, through Foreign Affairs, about the existence of a Hezbollah network in this country?
- What steps will the government take to ensure that Hezbollah does not present a danger to domestic interests and institutions in Canada?
- and will [Gray] ask the immigration minister to tighten regulations on refugee claims from Iran, Syria and other nations believed to sponsor terrorism?

Gray did not respond.

Woman sends bomb threats

TORONTO — A woman described as unbalanced is under investigation for sending threatening flyers to a number of Metro synagogues and for one bomb threat.

Earlier this month, part of a shopping plaza in the Bathurst-Wilson area was evacuated after a note was received threatening that there would be bombings there until the end of April.

Police at 32 Division, however, are not treating the incident as a serious threat. They say the woman does not have the means to carry out the actions. Police add that an arrest is unlikely, since the suspect is unstable.

CORRECTION

Fight against anti-Semitism never over, says ADL

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The Jewish community must remain vigilant about anti-Semitism, says the assistant national director of the U.S.-based Anti-Defamation League (ADL).

"We should have no illusions that the problems are not still with us. We must continue to monitor violence. When anti-Semitism is in the margins, it is bad enough, but when it gets support in the mainstream, such as with the Nation of Islam [it is even worse]," Kenneth Jacobson told Hadassah-WIZO members at their recent national executive meetings.

Although the ADL has monitored hate groups for years, Jacobson said, it sees the Internet "as a new vehicle for haters. We must all be aware and make sure that young people do not fall under their agenda."

On a positive note, he said that the Holocaust is more and more on people's minds "and Jews recognize that they are no longer passive and helpless. They can speak out against those that do wrong things."

A current issue on the agenda, Jacobson said, is how various countries conducted themselves during and after the Holocaust, and about the responsibility of these nations after the war ended.

Citing Switzerland, Jacobson said people are now focusing on activities that went on there during the war.

"A lot of people who were hesitant about being critical of western nations are now more open to facing the truth. They learned the lesson of the Holocaust — they cannot afford to be silent."

Switzerland, he said, "according to Swiss mythology, was neutral during the war. But then an issue comes along that challenges its self-image. It is hard for the Swiss to look honestly at what went on during the Holocaust.

"There is no doubt that the Germans benefited from this," he said.

Following the war, he said, these issues came up and an effort was made to track dormant accounts the Swiss had seized. Some money was eventually returned to Jews and their survivors and some to the central banks, but "outrage grew and the Swiss decided to set up an investigation committee to examine records to determine how many claims are still outstanding."

Jacobson said the ADL went on a recent mission to Switzerland because it was concerned that, as a result of the new focus on dormant accounts, the ADL "was afraid that the Holocaust would not be kept in perspective.

"We feel that we played a role in persuading the Swiss to take a moral leap forward. It announced it would set up a fund of $170 million and confirmed that the money would be dispersed to east European survivors. The country is also setting up a foundation in which it will take the interest from the gold and spend it on Holocaust survivors.

"These are steps," Jacobson said, "that we felt could make a difference. We are living in good circumstances, he said, and have ways of raising issues we could not have raised before... We are a lucky generation. We live in a society that encourages us to speak out."

There's a new Caplan in Oriole

TORONTO — Two well-known Jewish political figures have won their parties' nominations for candidacy on the federal and provincial scenes.

David Rotenberg, a former MPP and provincial cabinet minister, last week won the federal Tory nomination in Eglinton-Lawrence.

Rotenberg wins federal Tory nomination

He'll face the riding's current MP, Liberal Joe Volpe.

Rotenberg was the Conservative MPP for Wilson Heights for eight years and served in the cabinet of the short-lived government of Premier Frank Miller.

He was also a Toronto and Metro councillor for 12 years and tallies a long list of Jewish communal activity.

And David Caplan, a two-term North York Board of Education trustee, has won the provincial Liberal nomination in Oriole riding.

Caplan, who is Elinor Caplan's son, won the nomination on the first ballot, defeating lawyer Nirmala Persaud. About 400 Liberals were on hand for the vote.

Elinor Caplan stepped down as Oriole's MPP last month in order to plan her federal campaign. She was recently appointed by Prime Minister Jean Chrétien as the Liberal candidate in the coming federal election in the new riding of Thornhill.

David Caplan, 32, represents Ward 14 on the board of education. He's also vice-chair of the Metropolitan Toronto School Board.

Following his victory, he called on Premier Mike Harris to call a byelection in Oriole as soon as possible.

We must reconnect with our past and its rich heritage

Dear Friends,

This year as we prepare for Passover, the Festival of Freedom, and for the first seder it is incumbent upon us to remember how much Jews in Israel and around the world have achieved as a free people and a free nation. One of the great challenges facing the Jewish community today is that of assimilation.

Message from CJC national president

Goldie Hershon

The buzzword of our generation is continuity and it is indeed paradoxical that our freedom has enslaved us and that we no longer know who and what we are. Thousands of years after the exodus from Egypt we must, as the Haggadah enjoins us, feel as our ancestors felt in their struggle and flight. We must reconnect with our past and its rich heritage and traditions.

Fifty years since the end of World War II and the Holocaust, we are faced with daily disclosures of complicity with the Nazi regime and events that we could never have imagined. World attention is focused on Switzerland, as that nation confronts its past and struggles with ways to provide restitution to the survivors of the Holocaust. Other nations in Europe must come to terms with their past and offer justice to citizens who were stripped of all their possessions and endured unspeakable pain and suffering.

This Passover, Canada remains a safe haven for suspected Nazi war criminals. It has now been 10 years since the Deschenes Commission of Inquiry, yet only one individual has been deported. Time is running out to bring these individuals to justice. It is ironic that the work of an American private investigator placed this issue on the front burner and brought international pressure to bear on Canada.

We must now continue to press our government to act and make amends for Canada's shame on this issue.

We Jews in Canada are fortunate. We live in freedom in a country where we can practise our religion fully and with pride, and where we are able to participate in the affairs of our nation and make meaningful contributions. This freedom comes with responsibility and must be taken seriously.

In Israel, Passover will be marked with advances in the peace process. There have been setbacks, some with tragic consequences, but this must not deter us from our dream.

Canadian Jewry must make it a priority to visit the State of Israel, demonstrating our support for and commitment to our homeland. The miracle of the first exodus reverberates through history with more recent exoduses of Soviet, Ethiopian, and Syrian Jews. That miracle continues to have the power to provide vision and strength. We pray that Jews who are not free will soon find freedom. Wishing you a joyous and kosher Pesach.

Reform seder to focus on the role of women

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Women and men alike will learn about the role women played in the Passover story at Canadian Women for Reform Judaism's second annual seder.

The seder, which was attended last year by more than 125 people, will be held at Holy Blossom Temple on April 27 from 1:30 to 3:30 p.m.

Many women do not get a chance to fully partake in the seder experience, says seder chair Janice Babins. "Hopefully this will enrich them and give them the opportunity to learn."

Rabbi Ariel Friedlander, assistant rabbi at Holy Blossom, says that in the traditional Hagaddah service, there are no women mentioned. " All the stories are about sons. We are adding a missing component to the story."

It is called a feminist seder, rather than a women's seder because they want to include men, she said. "There are some men who are feminists and we want them to enjoy the experience."

The feminist Hagaddah does not exclude males, said Rabbi Friedlander, but rather, it brings men and women together. "The focal person is Miriam who was instrumental in the story of Exodus. We are including her because in the past she was excluded."

If you make only one dedication in your life, it should be this one.

Jerusalem

Judging by the constant references in the media, most editorialists appear to have adopted the Palestinian Authority's (PA) characterization of the construction project on Har Choma as a "settlement" in "historically Arab East Jerusalem." But this characterization is entirely inaccurate.

Har Choma is not a settlement; nor is it part of historically Arab East Jerusalem.

Har Choma is part of Jerusalem, the hilltop on the southern slopes between Kibbutz Ramat Rachel and Gilo.

However, given the frequency and the nature of the West Bank rioting in recent weeks, and that the PA has attributed the violence to the Har Choma construction, the "myth" is quickly metamorphosing into "fact."

The Har Choma tactic by the PA is part of their overall Jerusalem strategy, namely, to wrest control of an undivided Jerusalem away from Israel. Thus we increasingly hear Yasser Arafat, his deputies and his rioting rank and file warn the western and the Muslim world against the "Judaization of Jerusalem."

The New York Times

In effect therefore, as many observers have noted, the battle for Jerusalem has already begun. As a result, the community must be ready to engage the other side in that battle.

Passover is a fitting occasion to ready communal forces in defence of the justice of Israel's — and thus the Jewish people's — cause. For only at Passover and Yom Kippur do we end our services with the communal call: Next Year in Jerusalem. Whether intended literally or metaphorically, its inclusion in the service is indicative of its place in our devotions.

There are of course, a number of other "proofs" of Jerusalem's place in our devotions.

For example, in the course of its history, Jerusalem has known many rulers. But only for the Jewish people, three times, has it been the capital of an independent, sovereign state.

The word Jerusalem appears 656 times in the Bible. It appears in the Koran never.

And when we convey condolences to a mourner, we urge him to be comforted along with all other mourners in Zion.

We are quickly approaching the 30th anniversary, in June, of Jerusalem's reunification. In the 19 years preceding its reunification, it was divided by barbed wires and concrete barriers. "Arab East Jerusalem" referred to the Arab quarter inside the old city, in the same manner that the Jewish quarter referred to the Jewish area inside the Old City.

Before the recent PA propaganda offensive began the hills on the southern slopes of the city were never referred to as historical Arab East Jerusalem. That is because they were not so, then. We must not let them become so, now.

THE FIRST ZIONIST CONFERENCE, BASEL 1897

"If the Near East question is partially solved together with the Jewish question, it will surely be of advantage to all civilized peoples. The advent of Jews would bring about an improvement in the situation of the Christians in the Orient."

Avid coverage of 'chosen people'

Regarding the article "The coverage of Israel in the Toronto Star" (CJN, March 27), which explained why there is always excessive coverage in the Toronto Star about Israel, such a tiny country, I would like to suggest a different response to the many legitimate answers that were conveyed in the article.

Perhaps the constant coverage of Israel relates to our understanding of the Jewish people as Am Segulah — the "Chosen People." Maybe it is the Jewish destiny that, no matter how few Jews there are or how small the Jewish State is, Jews will always be recognized in the world.

Whether Jews are acknowledged in the media in a positive or negative manner is not the issue being addressed here. The point is that throughout history, Jews have always been singled out, and will always be highlighted, simply because they are Jews. That seems to be the way G-d meant it to be.

Not the time to expose differences

During the last couple of weeks, I have been inundated by various representatives of the media to react and respond to the pronouncement of the Union of Orthodox Rabbis of America.

It is no secret that there are profound theological differences as to what constitutes authentic Judaism. It seems to me that any statement made is often misconstrued and misinterpreted for the purpose of enhancing one's own personal agenda.

Inasmuch as the State of Israel is under enormous pressure, I believe we must set aside whatever divides us and focus our efforts on behalf of our beleaguered State of Israel.

Another view on Jerusalem

As a Holocaust survivor I have special reasons for wanting Israel to be strong and prosperous. This implies a political must: reaching an accommodation with the Palestinians and with the rest of the Arab world.

This objective calls for cool assessments and not for religious and nationalistic frenzy that I see as a formidable threat to the very survival of Israel. The Jerusalem idolators would do well to remember that Judaism has survived for close to 2,000 years without a square inch of earthly "metaphysical fulcrums." What I find particularly depressing is that instead of acting as a voice of moderation and sanity the usually reasonable CJN seems to have joined editorially the "Jerusalem idolatry party."

Don't forget sweatshops and Triangle Fire

Your article on Michael Taube (Feb. 20) shows how much we have drifted from Jewish social democratic ideals. Has it been that long since Ellis Island, the sweatshops and the Triangle Fire? Taube feels that Jews should look more "introspectively." To view any part of the world introspectively is to see only our own interests. It is to see only the trees and ignore the forest.

Taube states that Jews should support Republicans in the United States. Pat Buchanan and Oliver North have both found homes in the Republican party. This would be a strange house for any Jew to live in. As for the Reform party, one must ask why have so many extremists been attracted to that party?

Opposes 'land for peace' formula

"Arbeit macht frei" — Work makes you free — was the slogan heading the entrance to the Auschwitz concentration camp. This was the slogan the Nazis used to persuade us to enter their extermination camp peacefully.

"Land for peace" is the Arab slogan used to persuade us to withdraw to an indefensible position that would help them achieve their final solution for the state of Israel.

How long will we play ostrich, deliberately refusing to face the truth?

While we sing songs of peace, the Arabs are teaching their children songs of war and preparing them for the jihad that they will soon be fighting.

During the Baruch Goldstein massacre, Jewish students the world over lit candles of mourning to show that they condemned the murder of innocents. Where are the Arab students when our innocents are murdered? They are busy disseminating anti-Israel propaganda.

We must all unite and support Israel's fight for its very survival. If we are not for ourselves, who will be for us?

Excerpts from Agudath Harabonim ruling...

A Historic Declaration: The Union of Orthodox Rabbis of the United States and Canada (Agudath Harabonim) hereby declares: Reform and Conservative are not Judaism at all. Their adherents are Jews, according to the Jewish Law, but their religion is not Judaism.

The Agudath Harabonim has always been on guard against any attempt to alter, misrepresent or distort the Halachah (Jewish Law) as transmitted in the written and oral law, given by G-d through Moses on Sinai. It has therefore, rejected recognition of Reform and Conservative movements as Judaism, or their clergy as rabbis. It has publicly rebuffed the claim of "three wings of Judaism." There is only one Judaism: Torah Judaism. The Reform and Conservative are not Judaism at all, but another religion.

The present declaration is not based upon a new decision in Jewish Law. It is as old as Sinai. It is only given new emphasis and vehemence, sounding an alarm and warning signal, because of the new dangers wrought by the Conservative and Reform movements. Their condoning interfaith marriages, null and void conversions and homosexuality are repugnant not only to Torah Judaism, but also to common morality. Yet, they do this in the name of "Judaism."

This declaration is thus a clarion call to all, that despite their brazen usurpation of the titles "Judaism," "Jewish Heritage," "Jewish Tradition," "Jewish Continuity" Reform and Conservative are not Judaism at all. They are outside of Torah and outside of Judaism.

Having caused havoc in the United States, leading generations of Jews toward assimilation and intermarriage, they now attempt to export their alien ideology to Israel. By promoting pluralism in Judaism, they seek to be recognized as rabbis entitled (contrary to existing law in Israel) to carry out rabbinical functions, such as marriage, divorce, and conversion, contrary to Torah law.

In addition to the above from a Torah perspective, it is imperative to support Israel's government in their refusal to change the status quo regarding the exclusive Orthodox Rabbinic authority. Even non-Orthodox political leaders recognize that unless Jewish religious family law remains under the authority of the sole Rabbinate, the Jewish nation would be hopelessly divided.

We appeal to our fellow Jews, members of the Reform and Conservative movements: Having been falsely led to believe by heretical leaders that Reform and Conservative are legitimate branches or denominations of Judaism, we urge you to be guided by this declaration, and withdraw from your affiliation with Reform and Conservative temples and their clergy. Do not hesitate to attend an Orthodox synagogue due to your inadequate observance of Judaism. On the contrary, it is because of that inadequacy that you need to attend an Orthodox synagogue where you will be warmly welcomed.

Excerpts from the halachic ruling by the Agudath Harabonim (The Union of Orthodox Rabbis). The CJN asked the following rabbis for their reactions:

...Canadian Rabbis respond

By RABBI ARNOLD FINE

Recently, the Union of Orthodox Rabbis (UOR) published a "historic declaration" which appears to invalidate the synagogue movements with whom they disagree. The Conservative and Reform streams are presently their target. Will others, when they disagree with them, get the same treatment?

There is more than enough to unite all branches of Judaism so that the schism, which the UOR is encouraging, has no value. Indeed, ideological and theological unity is also often painfully missing in the Haredi camp, where the UOR resides. Thus, this group does not speak for anyone but themselves and their affiliated organizations.

Jews in North America and elsewhere in the world are pluralistic. While that may be very upsetting for the UOR, calling other expressions of Judaism invalid is not only harmful, but destructive for all of us. Instead of casting stones and wasting important community resources, energy and time, we should be exploring methods of not only how to live together, but also how to cooperate in dealing with the unique circumstances with which we live.

This initiative will have no real effect on our communities. It has, however, weakened the ties some have had with UOR institutions and further isolated them from the mainstream of the North American Jewish community.

The enmity that has been generated can only be mitigated by a demonstration, by all parties, of ahavat hinam (gratuitous love of one Jew for another). Torah is the most powerful medium we have. We all have the responsibility to make our love for it real by disseminating it and making it available to the widest extent in our community. That alone determines our validity!

By RABBI REUVEN P. BULKA

The recent divisive pronouncement of the Union of Orthodox Rabbis was and remains greatly distressing.

At first, the spin doctors hired by this group gave the impression that Conservative and Reform Jews were not to be considered Jewish. Then, at the scheduled news conference, more than a week after the "news" had already been revealed, these rabbis denied this. They had to, because such a comment is not only preposterous; it is also halachically wrong.

The pronouncement they did make was categorically renounced by the most representative bodies of North American Orthodox Judaism, the Rabbinical Council of America and the Union of Orthodox Jewish Congregations of America.

The aforementioned rabbinic pronouncement has effectively united all streams of Judaism in rejecting divisive comments.

We do not delude ourselves regarding the serious differences between the various streams of Judaism, and we must come together to resolve the very serious "status issues." But there are so many areas of common concern in which we work together.

We welcome the togetherness expressed after the divisive pronouncement, and hope that the commitment to working together for the common good will prevail over all attempts to destroy the community.

And let me take this opportunity for a commercial on a pet peeve — there is no such thing as an Orthodox, Conservative or Reform Jew. We are either Jewish or not. Any further adjective only further accentuates differences and breeds division.

Rabbi Bulka is the spiritual leader of Congregation Machzikei Hadas in Ottawa.

By RABBI REUBEN POUPKO

The ill-conceived statement of the Agudath Harabonim brings into focus a host of serious issues. I choose to address not the short-term public relations wrestling match, but rather, one aspect of the potential long-term damage of this verbal stone throwing.

Imagine for a moment the impact the now infamous statement would have on a young American Jew whose ties to Jewish life are, in all likelihood, quite tenuous. For many, being Jewish is nothing more than an ethnic label and the fact of one's Jewishness compels no unique behavior or commitment. The intuitive, minimal sense of "belonging" is no longer part of the psyche of the majority of young people of Jewish descent in the United States. For them, this statement is just one more outward push from the Jewish tent. Ironically, the drafters of the statement, as hard as it is to believe, actually thought they were issuing a clarion call for wayward Jews to return.

The rebuilding of Jewish identity begins with embracing the idea and reality of Jewish peoplehood. While diversity has been a near constant of Diaspora life, a sense of commonality and shared destiny could be counted upon to allow Jews to feel themselves part of the same people. Perhaps the most damaging consequence of the statement of the Agudath Harabonim is that it strengthens the feeling of alienation already felt by too many young Jews, at the very moment in our history when the idea of peoplehood and belonging is in such a state of disrepair.

The rabbis involved should pay heed to the Hippocratic oath: "Above all, do no harm."

Rabbi Poupko is the spiritual leader of Beth Israel Beth Aaron Congregation in Montreal.

By RABBI WAYNE ALLEN

The recent declaration of the Agudath Harabonim is more significant in what it reveals than in what it actually says.

It reveals a glaring ignorance of the last 200 years of Jewish history. Reform, Orthodox and Conservative Judaism all emerged as responses to the assimilation engendered by emancipation and enlightenment. While it is proper to debate whether any of these three movements offered an effective solution to assimilation, it is undeniably clear that none of these movements was its cause. In fact, it could be argued, in the State of Israel where there continues to be an Orthodox monopoly of religion, disenchantment with Judaism and consequent secularism can only be attributed to the brand of Judaism the Agudath Harabonim now wishes to impose on others.

It reveals a fundamental misunderstanding of the dynamics of Jewish demography. Reform and Conservative Judaism, statistics show, have saved and continue to save Jews from being lost to assimilation. Both offer affiliation to those Jews who, if forced to choose between Orthodoxy and assimilation, would be lost to Judaism forever.

It reveals the popular, though erroneous, assumption that Reform and Conservative Judaism are theologically identical in their approach and differ only in degree. The fact is that Conservative Judaism claims to be bound by Halachah, Jewish Law. And while its application of Halachah may differ from that of the Agudath Harabonim, it is only because of the wide range of views available for application. The Reform movement, by its own admission, makes no claim to be bound by Halachah.

And it sadly reveals to what extent a largely insignificant group of rabbis unhappy with their irrelevance in Jewish life will go to gain headlines.

Rabbi Allen is the spiritual leader of Beth Tikvah Synagogue in Toronto.

By RABBI DOW MARMUR

Rabbis excommunicating Jews they disapprove of is an old sport. Baruch Spinoza, the 17th-century philosopher, may have been the most celebrated victim, but he was not the only one.

Today, such acts carry no weight, because the rabbis who proclaim them have no power. And when you don't have clout, you make noise. This particular noise took the form of a press conference and a bizarre statement that Conservative and Reform Judaism are not Judaism.

The attackers represent the intransigent fringe of North American Jewry. It seems that they resorted to speaking to those they would call goyim to attract the attention of the members of Israel's Knesset. For in Israel, unlike the Diaspora, extreme Orthodoxy has clout through its political parties. The press statement appears to be a pathetic act of solidarity.

I first assumed that it was a Purim spoof, albeit in bad taste. That it is meant seriously makes it so much more laughable. For no amount of blustering by ultra-Orthodox rabbis and their disciples will deligitimize or demoralize members of Reform and Conservative congregations; they constitute the majority of Diaspora Jewry and remain in the mainstream. For them to defend themselves would bestow credibility on the attackers, which they don't deserve.

Rabbi Marmur is the spiritual leader of Holy Blossom Temple in Toronto.

Opinions

Mandela and Sharansky

By Emil Fackenheim in Jerusalem

Recently, Nelson Mandela's daughter was asked on TV how her father had emerged so strong, after 20 years in jail, and she answered very movingly — so much so that I asked myself, have we got a counterpart, in Israel? But of course: Natan Sharansky!

The two cases are so similar. Both were jailed endlessly. Neither ever lost the courage of his convictions. And their justice was recognized by the world. In Mandela's case world approval was wholehearted; it might have less so, perhaps, in Sharansky's case, had he been a Jew fighting for a Jewish right only, aliyah to Israel, but he was also a civil-rights fighter for everybody. And when he recently returned to Moscow as an Israeli cabinet minister, he showed by word and deed that he still cared for the captives there, as much as when he had been one himself.

There are many differences between the two, of course, but what is the big one? Mandela wanted liberation in his own country and he has got it, both it and the approval of the world. Sharansky wanted liberation from exile, but is only baderech (on the way) — until the world approves the Jewish return to Jerusalem.

There are political reasons for this, even political justice, but nobody can tell me that age-old prejudice is not involved. In 1948, when Jordan conquered Jerusalem's Old City, no protests were heard, not even when the Jewish Quarter was ravaged, its synagogues destroyed, Jewish cemeteries desecrated; not even when, contrary to armistice agreements, no Jew was allowed to worship at the Wall. The deafening silence of these 19 years was broken only when Britain and Pakistan spoke — formally to recognize the Jordanian conquest.

Now consider the contrast: In 1967, Israel conquered the Old City, annexed it and declared Jerusalem to be the eternal and united capital of the State of Israel and the Jewish people. This time the whole world spoke — or the General Assembly of the UN, claiming to represent it — to condemn the Israeli action as illegal and demand that it be reversed. The vote was 99-0.

And the UN position on Jerusalem now? A British foreign secretary, of all people, is instructing Israelis that it is "illegal" to keep territory occupied by force.

More troubling than the fact of surviving prejudice is its deliberate use. Yasser Arafat and others cannot be unaware that "Judaizing" Jerusalem is a loaded term, when "Arabizing" or "Islamizing" does not exist in the language; yet they keep using it. Similarly Arafat asserts that there is an Israeli "conspiracy" about Har Choma, when the action is open, public and —even though Jews are doing it — non-conspiratorial.

Most troubling of all is that prejudice is not merely used; it is being fanned. At a conference at Rome's Grand Mosque, Israel was attacked for intending not only to "Judaize" Jerusalem but also "to rebuild the Temple on the site of al-Aksa Mosque." No more inflammatory, hate-inciting charge could be made; it is a barefaced lie, and those spreading it know it. Yet the conference was attended by Christians as well as Muslims, and the delegates were received by the Vatican's foreign secretary.

Fanning the flames takes significant forms. Sheik Ra'ed Salah, head of the Islamic movement in Israel and mayor of Um El Fahem, asserts that it is "forbidden for Jews to pray at the Western Wall," for "the Temple was not really where the Jews claim it stood." So where was it? In Uganda, Argentina, New Zealand? Anywhere, so long as it is far from Jerusalem. Once prejudice is fanned with lies into fanaticism, there is no end of it.

Instead of thus regressing into prejudice and worse, should the world, in this age of pluralism, not progress toward a new perspective on Zionism? Had the exiles become another "lost tribe" rather than return to Jerusalem, neither Christianity nor Islam would ever have been born. Is it not time for these two "daughters" of Judaism (as my rabbi called them in bar mitzvah lessons) to show a little gratitude?

And, after the second Jewish return to Jerusalem — and a largely tragic history of "mother"-and-daughters," the "mother" with either "daughter," the "daughters" with each other — is it not time to end this family warfare?

Peace will come to Jerusalem if Christians, Muslims, Palestinians and others remain in Jerusalem or come to visit, worship and live there; not despite the fact that the Jews have returned, but because of it.

Saga of blinking eye

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

The news media recently reported the death of Jean-Dominique Bauby, a French journalist who had just published an unusual book. He was totally immobilized by a severe stroke and his communication skills were reduced to the blinking of his left eye, but his mind was totally intact. Thus he could neither speak nor move to let others know what went on inside of him. Only by blinking his eye was he able to reveal his thoughts and letter by letter, to dictate a book about the rovings of his mind, his fantasies and leaps of imagination. The book was at once acclaimed by the critics, but unfortunately Bauby died at age 44, a week after publication.

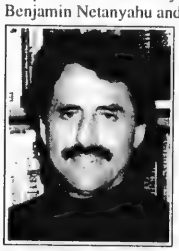
The story reinforced my abiding conviction that those who seem to be comatose or otherwise incapable of communicating, have most likely an active — and terribly frustrated — inner life.

The Bauby experience also revived my recollection of how I learned of the remarkable achievement of Franz Rosenzweig, probably this century's most influential Jewish theologian and philosopher. Thirty years ago, Commentary magazine published a series of essays entitled, What I Believe, reporting the belief structure of a group of American Jews. The interesting statistics of this book revealed that no fewer than 25 of the contributors called Rosenzweig the linchpin of their theological development. I was amongst the 25 and I recall how my dad first called my attention to Rosenzweig who was then suffering from what today we call Lou Gehrig's disease (from which he died in 1929). During the years of his disability, he carried on a wide-ranging correspondence, even though he was reduced to moving only the little finger on one of his hands. His wife, with the help of a complex machine, was able to translate his dictation into the written word. His correspondence was later published, and his cooperation with Martin Buber in the translation of the Hebrew Bible into German was path-breaking. His work was recently brought into focus again by Everett Fox's translation of the Torah into English, which was patterned on the Buber-Rosenzweig model and appeared a few years ago to wide acclaim.

I will always remember how Rosenzweig discovered Judaism. He was raised in an assimilated environment and contemplated converting to Christianity, but decided to do so only if he knew what he had left behind. An experience in a little shul in Berlin on Kol Nidre moved him profoundly and he abandoned any plan to convert. Instead, he devoted himself to an intense study of Hebrew and Jewish sources, and his deep faith and intellectual powers made his 43 brief years on earth a blessing for many of us. He had a tremendous influence on me, through the example of his struggle with his disability, his writings and especially his major work, The Star of Redemption (translated by William Hallo).

The human spirit is the strange and never fully understood core of our lives, and the blinking of an eye and a moving finger remind us that the spirit may be fully alive as long as our hearts beat and our beings draw breath.

Kiddie politics in Israel



By Martin Himel in Herzliya

If the implications weren't so tragic and painful, you could almost laugh at the political immaturity of Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Palestinian Chairman Yasser Arafat. They are acting like orphaned brothers, fighting, kicking and screaming, running to Uncle Bill in Washington or Grandpa Hussein in Amman each shouting louder than the other, "Yasser started it!" "No! Benjamin started first!"

Uncle Bill gives a deep sigh, thinking to himself, "You can't leave them alone in the Middle East; they just can't behave themselves."

So Uncle Bill first of all summons Benji and asks him to show some maturity by temporarily suspending settlement expansion "Uh, uh," says Benji, "not until Yasser stops being violent."

And when Uncle Bill asks Yasser to come over to kiss and make up, he turns to his buddies in Egypt and elsewhere, pouting, telling his Hamas friends to hit Benji a few more times, whispering, "Just don't tell anybody I told you so!"

Uncle Bill patiently asks him over the telephone, "Come on Yasser, quit kicking Benji and we'll talk about what bothers you."

Yasser sits there with those bulging eyes, trying to keep a straight face, not fooling a soul, saying, "I am not kicking him. I wouldn't do that!"

These two little league leaders are, unfortunately, playing in a deadly big league game.

Netanyahu kicks the Palestinians by commencing construction of Har Choma, a controversial Jerusalem suburb, which, by the way, he never intended to build. But Netanyahu is weak and when he has right-wing politicians breathing down his back, he relents.

I know these words bother many Jews in Canada. But don't worry, you will see the point soon enough. He is about to kick you as well, again out of weakness not strength. Netanyahu is bending again, this time to haredi pressure. He is supporting a controversial Knesset bill that will basically state that your Conservative and Reform synagogues are not synagogues, your rabbis are not rabbis, your converted spouses are not Jewish and worse still, your children are not Jewish.

When having to explain his stand to a conference of Reform Rabbis in the United States, Netanyahu got frightened and cancelled the meeting. He couldn't find the guts to admit that cynical political bargaining and not religious zeal is the motive behind his support for the bill.

Not only is he alienating Israel in the United States, Europe and the Arab World, now he is making progress in isolating Israel among its brothers and sisters in the Jewish Diaspora. It is a rare "talent."

And no, I have not forgotten the other side of the equation — Yasser Arafat. He just can't help it. Netanyahu handed him all the political cards. The PM went ahead and sent the bulldozers into action despite the moving plea from King Hussein, backed by the United States. If Arafat had shown restraint, he would have gained important political international capital for the Palestinians. Instead, he kicked like a child, looking the other way while his security forces released dangerous Hamas militants, who promptly ordered suicide bombings. Childish instant gratification will get Arafat and the Palestinians nowhere.

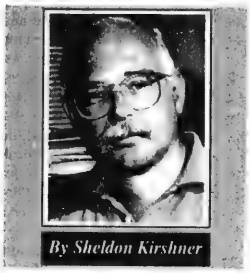
King Hussein kicked him out of Amman in the '80s. Syria's Hafez al-Assad swore never to have him in Damascus. He may find himself in deeper trouble if he continues to play with matches.

Arafat, Netanyahu, please grow up as fast as possible. A dying peace process and too many lives unfortunately depend on your very limited talents.

The Kirshner File

A cornucopia of books...

A torrent of books has cascaded across my my desk of late. I will review a handful of them in this column.



By Sheldon Kirshner

A History of the Jews (Orion), by Paul Johnson, was originally published in 1987 to critical acclaim. Now it is out in a paperback edition.

The Jewish Experience (HarperCollins, $53.50), edited by Norman Cantor, is an enlightened distillation of Jewish history, culture and philosophy as conveyed through essays, novels, short stories, memoirs and biographies.

The Chronicles of the Jewish People (Jonathan David, $25 US), written by Raymond Scheidlin, is what the title suggests, the story of Jews from ancient times to the present. It is lavishly illustrated.

Taking Root (Stoddart, $24.95), Gerald Tulchinsky's masterful account of Canadian Jewry from the mid-18th century to 1920, has been reprinted in a paperback edition.

Masha Greenbaum's The Jews of Lithuania (Gefen, $29.95), billed as the first English-language history of a remarkable community, is the best primer on the topic I've seen.

The third edition of David Kessler's The Falashas (Frank Cass, $37.50 US), with a new preface, may well be the last word on Ethiopian Jews.

Howard Sachar is a first-rate historian. He demonstrates his skills in two fine books — Farewell Espana: The World of the Sephardim Remembered (Random House, $42) and A History of Israel From The Rise of Zionism To Our Time (Alfred Knopf, $30 US).

The Oxford Dictionary of the Jewish Religion (Oxford University Press, $185) seems like a definitive work, being composed of 2,400 alphabetically arranged entries in 764 pages. The editors are R.J. Zwi Werblowsky and Geoffrey Wigoder.

In Paths of Emancipation (Princeton University Press, $16.95 US), edited by Pierre Birnbaum and Ira Katznelson, eight historians rigorously analyse the manner in which Jews obtained civil and political rights in Russia, Britain, Italy, Germany, France, Holland, Turkey and the United States.

In 1096 Pope Urban II unleashed a series of assaults against major Jewish communities in the Rhineland. Robert Chazan, in European Jewry and the First Crusade (University of California Press, $17.95 US), lucidly analyses these cataclysmic events.

Physical force, as David Nirenberg explains in Communities of Violence (Princeton University Press, $29.95 US), set the terms and limits of coexistence for minorities in medieval Europe. The author argues that attacks on Jews and Muslims, far from being irrational outbursts, were manipulated by certain groups.

Bernard Lewis, one our greatest historians, explores a seminal year, 1492, in Christians, Muslims and Jews in the Age of Discovery (Oxford University Press, $14.95). A companion volume, Andrew Wheatcroft's The Ottomans, (Penguin, $16.99), dissects an empire where Jews found refuge after the Spanish Inquisition.

Shakespeare and the Jews (Columbia University Press, $29.50 US) is fascinating. Drawing on a motherlode of scholarship, James Shapiro explores attitudes toward Jews in Elizabethan England. Read it in conjunction with Bryan Cheyette's Constructions of 'the Jew' in English Literature and Society (Cambridge University Press, $18.95 US), which deals with such writers as Matthew Arnold, Rudyard Kipling, H.G. Wells and James Joyce.

Dan Miron's A Traveller Disguised (Syracuse University Press, $16.95 US), now in paperback, was originally published in 1973. It's a watershed in scholarship, the first major work in English on 19th-century Yiddish fiction.

Remember To Dream (Jewish Radical Education Project, New York) is a systematic survey of Jewish radicalism since the 18th century. Robert Wolfe casts a discerning eye on all the trends, from Marxism and Bundism to Zionism and Territorialism.

Think about it. In 20th-century America, who has made the greatest contributions? For an answer, dip into 100 Influential People (Fulcrum Publishing). Seven of those listed are Jewish.

If you're writing an essay, a speech or a report, Great Jewish Quotations (Jonathan David, $29.95 US) may be of use. Selected and annotated by Alfred Kolatch, the entries draw on a variety of sources, including the Talmud, literary notables and sports and political figures.

Henrietta Szold (Gefen) is a tribute to an outstanding American woman and a Zionist stalwart. Text and photos are by the late Nachim Tim Gidal.

When 50 photographers descend on a city, the results are bound to be interesting. And so they are in Jerusalem (HarperCollins, $49), a handsome coffee-table book which distils its essence in sharply-etched photographs.

The common experiences of Jews and blacks in the United States are juxtaposed against the backdrop of the blackface tradition in American stage and film in an original book, Blackface, White Noise (University of California Press, $24.95 US), by Michael Rogin.

The music world lost a giant when Leonard Bernstein died in 1990. In Conversations About Bernstein (Oxford University Press, $37), by William Burton, friends, collaborators and critics remember the conductor and composer.

Germany's relationship with Jews and with Israel is nothing if not tangled. Michael Wolffsohn, in Eternal Guilt? (Columbia University Press, $27.50 US), examines it searchingly.

By contrast, Bjorn Kronndorfer's thought-provoking book, Remembrance and Reconciliation (Yale University Press, $25 US), looks at the range of emotions that come into play when the grandchildren of Holocaust survivors and Germans meet on common ground.

When Raimonda Kopelnitsky and her Jewish family left the Soviet Union in 1989, she began keeping a diary. No Words to Say Goodbye (Little Brown, $24.95) poignantly records their journey to the United States, via Austria and Italy, and her wrenching adjustment to a new land.

As the Jewish Agency's chief representative in Moscow from 1989 to 1995, Baruch Gur-Gurevitz played an integral role in the mass movement of Soviet Jews to Israel. In Open Gates (The Bialik Institute), he recounts the inside story of their aliyah. And in After Gorbachev (The Zionist Library), he explains how the upheavals in the Soviet Union affected local Jews.

Isaac Babel, the distinguished novelist, kept a journal when he rode with the Cossack cavalry during the Soviet Union's war with Poland. 1920 Diary (Yale University Press, $20) reveals his fears, his doubts and his torn identity as a Jew and a revolutionary.

The temptations and pitfalls of assimilation are cogently probed by Barry Rubin, an Israeli scholar, in Assimilation and its Discontents (Random House, $35), a lively historical account of that phenomenon.

Wearing his other hat in Under This Blazing Light (Cambridge University Press, $19.95 US), Israeli novelist Amos Oz turns political commentator in this book. The results are felicitous.

Devotees of Yiddish literature will be pleased to learn that Schocken Books, in collaboration with Random House, has published a new English-language edition of the following classics: The Dybbuk by S. Ansky, Tevye the Dairyman and The Railroad Stories by Sholem Aleichem and Tales of Mendele the Book Peddler by Mendele Moykher Sforim. In addition, The I.L. Peretz Reader, edited by Ruth Wisse, is now available.

The Steinsaltz Talmud

The Talmud, The Steinsaltz Edition. A Reference Guide* (Random House, $35 (paperbound).

The Talmud, The Steinsaltz Edition. Volume XI, Ketubot Part V* (Random House, $70).

The Steinsaltz Reference Guide, now reissued in paperbound form, is an invaluable contribution to the study and understanding of the Talmud. After a helpful introduction to the nature of the Talmud and its historical background, the guide lists the most prominent sages and describes the diverse tractates. It provides a brief introduction to Aramaic and supplies background notes of all sorts — astronomical, bibliographical, historical. It contains a dictionary of halachic concepts, a chapter on weights and measures and the layout of a talmudic page. All in all, it is an impressive work of organization and scholarship.

Tractate Ketubot, Part V, covers chapters 6, 7 and 8 of the tractate. It deals primarily with financial aspects of the marriage agreement: the dowry brought into the marriage by the wife; the property that remains in the wife's possession after the marriage, but which the husband is permitted to use and from which he benefits; and the sum that the husband is obligated to give to his wife should the marriage be terminated. It also discusses the circumstances under which a woman can demand divorce and receive that sum, and the situations in which a man can divorce his wife without being required to pay it.

Steinsaltz vocalizes the Hebrew and Aramaic and includes a literal translation of the text as well as a much more elaborate translation and commentary. The commentary of Rashi, the revered 11th-century scholar, is also included but not translated.

When the five books of Moses achieved their final form — according to most scholars around 500 BCE — Jews who were eager to follow the will of God were confronted with numerous questions about the text. Many passages needed interpretation; seeming contradictions had to be resolved; new and unprecedented legal and ethical problems cried out for decisions.

As a result of this need for clarification there arose in Palestine and Babylonia (Iraq) academies of learning where sages and scholars studied and debated the problems presented by the Torah text. After 600 or so years, these discussions, regarded as the Oral Law, were committed to writing by Rabbi Yehudah ha-Nasi (Judah the Prince) shortly after 200 CE. He divided the material into "six orders" and 63 tractates that covered all aspects of Jewish law.

This work, known as the Mishnah, became the obvious textbook for further legal or halachic study in the academies. As generation succeeded generation the debates and arguments of the rabbis produced a further body of tradition, supplementing the Mishnah and vastly exceeding it in volume. Written largely in Aramaic, unlike the Mishnah which is written in Hebrew, this material was called Gemara — in Hebrew, "to complete," in Aramaic "to learn." It reached its final form around 500 CE.

The Gemara which follows a particular paragraph of the Mishnah often runs to several pages before it "exhausts itself" and the next paragraph of the Mishnah is introduced. "Essentially, the Gemara examines the Mishnah text under a magnifying glass, phrase by phrase, in order to determine as precisely as possible what the law is or should be. In the process, it presents arguments between two or more rabbis, which sometimes become so complicated that it requires strenuous intellectual effort to follow them."

Frequently, the Gemara digresses into topics which are not directly relevant and more than half of the Talmud consists of aggadah "a magical rabbinic mode of thought in which myth, theology, memory, poetry and superstition robustly mingle."

The Talmud, the combination of Mishnah and Gemara, is as vast and deep as the sea. It is a monument to the intellectual exertion of 1,500 or more scholars over close to a millennium. For the traditional Jew the Halachah has its origin in the Torah, but can only be properly understood and followed as interpreted by the Talmud — and later authorities.

About 30 years ago, Rabbi Adin Steinsaltz of Jerusalem began the herculean task of rendering the Babylonian Talmud into modern Hebrew and providing his own commentary. Often referred to as a genius, and hailed by Time magazine as "a once-in-a-millennium-scholar," the frail Steinsaltz, who began to explore Judaism on his own as a teenager, is multilingual and an expert in fields as diverse as biblical zoology and Jewish mysticism.

The ongoing Random House English translation of the Talmud is a publishing event in every sense of the word. It is one more indication of how the vast treasury of Jewish learning is being made available to the English speaking Jewish community.

Jewish community has a stake in CBC's vitality

By ARLENE PERLY RAE

The CBC is at risk. Its annual budget today, in real dollars, is half of what it was in 1984. Thousands of people have lost their jobs and programs have been cut. Canada now spends less per capita on public broadcasting than any other country in the industrialized world. It costs every Canadian $32.19 a year to support the CBC. Sweden spends $116.95 per person for their public broadcasting system.

What does this mean for the Jewish community in Canada? Plenty! Our history has shown that Jews can only thrive in a pluralistic society that values a diversity of ideas and opinions. We require and value a society based on reason, argument and debate. And in a society of that kind, a free press is critical. When access to the airwaves and newspapers is restricted, when only a few "accepted truths" are permitted, Jews are uniquely vulnerable. When the winds of history turn against us, as they have so often in the past, a free and open press is a vital instrument in our defence.

That is why the CBC is so important to the Canadian Jewish community. No one would suggest that the people controlling the Canadian print and broadcast media today pose any threat to our freedom or survival. But we cannot help but be concerned as the control of much of our media becomes concentrated in fewer and fewer hands. This may lead to a narrower range of voices and opinions being heard. Only a strong public broadcaster, unfettered by the demands of both state and marketplace, can resist this trend. That is why we need strong and vigorous electronic media, both television and radio.

Over the years the CBC and the Jewish community have had an uneasy relationship. On the plus side, the CBC has presented courageous and deeply moving stories and dramas about the struggles of Jews in Canada and around the world. In 1989, a gripping CBC Radio documentary about two young holocaust survivors won a Peabody Award.

On television, we laughed at the stories of young Max Glick growing up Jewish in Winnipeg. What private broadcaster would tell these stories? And think of the Jewish stars we have come to know through the CBC — from Lorne Greene to Wayne and Shuster, Al Waxman, Ralph Benmergui, Bar-

That's some fine kosher wine

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Little did Rabbi Dov Behr Manischewitz [http://www.manischewitz.com/108years.htm] know over a century ago that his name would become associated with one of the largest kosher wine companies in the world. Despite their popularity, labels like Cream Strawberry Coconetta, Loganberry and the venerable Concord Grape haven't convinced wine drinkers that kosher wines can compare with the finest that France, Italy or California have to offer.

Many kosher winemakers say their products can rival the best in the world. And they are trying to get that message across by using the Jewish Highway. So what better time to sample their sites and their wares than Passover!

Where did the idea that kosher wine equals sweet wine come from?

According to the Kosher Wine Institute [http://www.kedemwines.com/institut.htm], "the poor quality of Kosher wine is due largely to historical circumstance. The Concord grape, the only available variety for Jewish immigrants arriving in the New York area, is an acidic grape which must be balanced with sugar to be enjoyed. Hence, sweet wine. Time passes, and compromise becomes tradition."

For an excellent article that tracks the evolution of kosher wine from sweet to dry, see Vineyard Vanguard: The New Taste of a Well-Aged Tradition [http://bnaibrith.org/ijm/articles/wine/index.html].

I was particularly impressed with the Web sites of two family-run wineries. The Herzog Family's giant Royal Wine Corporation [http://www.kedemwines.com/] traces its roots to 19th century Czechoslovakia. The company is now based in New York and is known for its Kedem and Baron Herzog lines. Abarbanel Wines [http://www.kosher-wine.com/menu.html] is based in the Languedoc-Roussillon region in the southwest of France along the Mediterranean and near the border with Spain. (Incidentally, the family traces its name back to Don Yitzchak Abarbanel [http://www.kosher-wine.com/family/index.html], famed religious leader and royal advisor to Queen Isabella and King Ferdinand.)

Two winemakers from California's Napa Valley also have Internet sites: Hagafen Cellars [http://www.nauticom.net/users/judaica/Hagafen/] and St. Supery's Vineyards [http://wwwflavorweb.com:80/mtmaroma.htm].

And Manischewitz? Actually Manischewitz wine is not produced by Rabbi Dov Behr's B. Manischewitz Company [http://www.manischewitz.com/]. The famous name is licensed to Widmer's Wine Cellars of Naples, New York.

Widmer's does not have its own Web site, but you can find a listing of its Kosher for Passover products at OU Online [http://www.ou.org/chagim/pesach/pesachguide/wines.html].

What about the wines of Israel? Daniel Rogov gives an excellent and detailed overview in Israeli cuisine and wine [http://www.travelnet.co.il/tnet/israel/general/cuisine.htm]. He even includes information on which wineries offer guided tours.

Although none of the Israeli wineries have extensive Internet sites, most can be found at Wineries in Israel [http://www.agmonet.co.il/wines/wineries.htm].

You'll find information about Golan Heights Winery, Segal's Wine, Baron Winery, Soreq Winery, Margalit Winery, Domain de Latroun, Tzora Estate Winery and the largest of them all, Carmel Mizrachi.

What makes a kosher wine kosher? The rules surrounding the production of kosher wine are much more stringent than those regarding other kinds of kosher food. In fact, no non-Jew can come in direct contact with the wine or associated machinery unless the juice has been briefly heated to between 85 and 90 degrees Celsius. Many critics of kosher wine claim that this "cooking" damages the wine, while the winemakers say modern techniques minimize the effects of the heating. For more details about kashrut and winemaking, see [http://www.kedemwines.com/kosher.htm] and [http://www.kosher-wine.com/wines/kashrut.html].

Finally, I found a delightful piece of Jewish wine trivia on the website of California winemakers Martini & Prati [http://www.winecoco.com/martini/martini.html#prohibition].

The Martini Wine Company was one of the few wineries in the United States to remain in operation during Prohibition. When Narciso Martini found out that rabbis were allowed 50 gallons of wine per year for religious purposes, "he shipped as much as 10,000 gallons of wine a year — all perfectly legal — to rabbis in New York for the duration of this period. 'It's amazing,' Elmo, his son, once recalled, 'how many more rabbis there suddenly were in New York during Prohibition.'"

So let us raise a glass to past and future popularity of kosher wines.

CBC tries to seek out true story

bara Frum, Ken Finkelman and many more. It's an impressive list. We have seen ourselves, our community, its members and its issues reflected on the screen and over the airwaves.

But there have been problems as well. Many Canadian Jews have been unhappy at times about the CBC's coverage of events in the Middle East. There have been claims that CBC reporters and editors are "anti-Israel." And yet Arab groups often bring the opposite complaint, suggesting the same unfair stereotype or biased reporting. What this says is that the CBC practises journalism the way it should be, attempting to ferret out the true story under very difficult and trying circumstances, without being beholden to any one side.

Good journalism will always make some people uncomfortable and unhappy, but as Jews, we know better than most the importance of journalists seeking and telling the truth. We might not always like the story or the manner in which it is covered. Mistakes will sometimes be made and we are fully within our rights as citizens to point them out when they are. But we must celebrate and even be grateful for the daring, intelligent and creative approach of a non-sensationalistic, free from influence, public broadcasting network determined and committed to bring Canadians in touch with each other and to bring events from around the world to all of us as well.

We must not let the CBC bleed away from neglect, underfunding or lack of public support. Why should a fundamental institution have to "get by" as a mere shadow of its former self? Nowhere in this country are journalistic standards and values held so high as they are at the CBC. Can you really imagine journalism in this country without it?

For 60 years, the CBC has helped Canadians discover and understand each other. Now the CBC needs the help of Canadians. The government must be told loudly and unequivocally that the cuts to the CBC have gone too far and they must stop. Please join the campaign to save the CBC. It is ours to keep.

Community Matters

Partnerships propel Women's Federation

As Jill Reitman enters her second year as President of Jewish Women's Federation, she looks forward to strengthening ties even further between JWF and the many community organizations representing the interests of women.

"Our goal has always been b'yachad - together," explained Reitman. "The best way to meet the needs of the community is by working in cooperation with other agencies and organizations that share common goals."

In recapping the highlights of last year at the recent JWF/UJA Federation Women's Campaign installation, Reitman emphasized JWF's attention to community response, woman abuse and Jewish continuity.

The Community Response Project, headed by Danita Dubinsky Aziza and Ellen Kachuck Rosenbluth, strives to assist the 23,000 Jews living in poverty in Toronto. CPR has worked closely with Jewish Family and Child Service and school parents' associations to organize clothing drives which have collected thousands of items for needy children.

Another committee, in partnership with the National Council of Jewish Women, has explored ways of providing food to hungry Jews across the city and is working together with other organizations toward creating a central depot to provide other necessities to the Jewish poor.

Reitman is also proud of the progress made in raising awareness of woman abuse and providing support for victims. On Tuesday, May 20, JWF is sponsoring an evening devoted to the subject at Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue. Reitman urges those planning to attend to bring a list of possible job opportunities to help women recovering from abuse achieve independence and self-sufficiency.

Reitman, noting the success of the Timeless Treasures Women's Learning Series, says "women have really turned on to learning and that will enhance both their leadership abilities and commitment to community. It also provides them with a great opportunity to explore their roots."

Campbell applauds 'outstanding year' for Women's Campaign

Although the 1997 UJA Federation Women's Campaign benefited greatly from the leadership of Chair Vicki Campbell, it is Campbell who feels lucky to have had what she calls "an opportunity of a lifetime."

"These past two years have been outstanding," said Campbell, who steered the $4 million dollar campaign, which brought in close to 500 new gifts.

Highlights for Campbell included the Lion of Judah and Atarah luncheon for top women campaign contributors, UJA Federation's Leadership Mission to Moscow, St. Petersburg and Israel and the International Lion of Judah Conference in Jerusalem last fall, which Campbell said provided her with "extraordinary pride and a real connection to world Jewry."

Campbell also applauded the success of a new Women's Campaign initiative that paired veteran volunteers with newcomers. "The mentoring teams were such a great way of welcoming new volunteers to campaign."

The outgoing Chair thanked her Vice-Chair Agi Mandel for her "wisdom and perseverance" and 1997 Portfolio Coordinators Carole Sterling, Cheryl Jackson and Judy Engel for their "exemplary skills in getting the job done."

"I have learned many things from many people," said Campbell. "I was honoured to follow in the footsteps of many outstanding women and I hope that I may be able to guide others as they have guided me."

Family history draws Mandel to new position

Agi Mandel's connection to UJA Federation began long before she was born.

It was her parent's heroic story of escape and survival after World War II. that inspiredMandel's deep Jewish commitment. The new UJA Federation Women's Campaign Chair recounted the tale with great emotion at her recent installation.

The brave journey from Czechoslovakia of Clara and Leslie Reitman, in 1950, began with a hasty departure by water. For five days, Clara, Leslie and their four year old son Ivan, now a prominent film producer/director, hid in a tiny space in a barge as they travelled down the Danube river to Vienna.

"My mother was frightened to death that she had miscalculated the amount of sleeping medication she had given my brother," recalled Mandel.

Once in Vienna, not knowing a soul and with nowhere to go, Mandel's father asked a taxi driver to take the family to a Jewish home - any Jewish home. "My father knew that Jews would help them," she explained. "These are our values, a strong heritage."

The people who welcomed her family put them in contact with HIAS, affiliated with Toronto's Jewish Immigrant Aid Service, a UJA Federation funded agency, which in turn provided them with shelter, money and the appropriate travel papers. They later made their way to France and finally Canada where Agi and her twin sister Susan were born.

Sisters in arms. Agi Mandel, 1998 Women's Campaign Chair, grabs a hug from twin sister Susan Michaels, JWF Vice-President.

"My community involvement is the direct result of the values I learned at home," Mandel said, stressing the importance of voluntarism.

"The more heavily involved I became the more I wanted to do. It was addictive."

Mandel took over from the outgoing Chair, Vicki Campbell, after serving as Campbell's Vice-Chair.

Community Matters

UJA FEDERATION URGES UNITY

The Jewish world is facing a challenge from the implications of a bill now before the Knesset to formalize Orthodox conversions and marriages in Israel, which, at the present time, is the status quo. UJA Federation urges participants, as they engage in this debate, not to lose sight of our vision of unity and klal yisrael.

For the past 80 years, UJA Federation has been a unifying force within the Jewish community because it has been a setting in which Jews of every affiliation can work together and contribute to the community's benefit.

The concern with this legislation is, in part, because of its perceived impact on the Law of Return and the open access of all Jews to the land of Israel.

While there is no direct impact on the Law of Return, the proposed legislation does reinforce the absence of recognition of Conservative and Reform movements. We recognize the pain and anguish these events produce.

UJA Federation seeks a course which respects the interests and views of all Jews. In doing so, we have formally endorsed a resolution by the Council of Jewish Federations on Religious Status In Israel. This resolution urges the government of Israel to "abstain from amending legislation or passing any new legislation which would change the current situation regarding recognition of conversion." It also calls for consultation with the Jewish Agency on any such legislation and no alteration to the Law of Return.

We appreciate the supportive statements from all segments of the Jewish community advocating the unity of the Jewish people and the importance of supporting UJA Federation.

Meeting Jewish needs, through UJA Federation, is a common objective. Only through working together can we successfully respond to the true challenges facing the Jewish people, here at home and around the world. Ways must be sought to ease the pain. We must never lose sight of the vision which has united klal yisrael and which has allowed us to build the kind of community we have today.

Lorie celebrates 60 years of service

Next year, the UJA Federation Women's Campaign will mark its 60th anniversary and it's thanks, in large part, to Lucille Lorie, a 20th Century fundraising pioneer.

Lorie, who recently celebrated her 93rd birthday, helped change the face of giving when, in 1938, she became the first Chair of the United Jewish Welfare Fund's Women's Campaign. The United Jewish Welfare Fund preceded UJA Federation.

"I felt it was time for women to contribute on their own apart from their husbands," explains Lorie. After contacting some friends and acquaintances, she organized the first meeting of what was to be the Women's Campaign, at the home of Pearl Sadowski.

"A lot of them agreed with what I was saying and, of course, some didn't," Lorie recalls. "I just told them they had an obligation to assume their own responsibility."

That initial gathering paved the way for what has grown to be a yearly $4 million dollar drive by the UJA Federation Women's Campaign.

While Lorie was mobilizing women to give on their own, Jews in Toronto were worried about the Nazi persecution of European Jewry and were themselves faced with growing antisemitism at home. Lorie recalls the difficulties she repeatedly encountered trying to obtain her son's acceptance at the prestigious University of Toronto Schools. "His marks were excellent but his name was Jewish."

Lucille Lorie receives help from her great-grandchildren while blowing out candles at her 93rd birthday celebration.

In addition to her pioneering efforts at UJA, Lorie became very active in the community after moving to Toronto from New York at age 21 to marry her husband Harold.

Lorie was instrumental in forming the National Council of Jewish Women and travelled across Canada by train to consolidate all 14 chapters.

She later became President of the NCJW and today remains Honourary President. Lorie looks forward to taking part in the organization's Centenary celebrations later this year.

Lorie says she is "honoured to have been a part of these wonderful organizations." They would no doubt respond that the honour was theirs.

Sterling heads Walk '97

Carole Sterling is learning there's a big difference between walking the Walk and running it.

Although Sterling, Chair of Walk '97 - Steppin' Out for Israel, Sunday, May 25, has been participating in the Walk, with husband Jay and children Lauren and Cory for many years, this is the first time she has played such an important role. "I think this event is unique because it ties fun together with community responsibility," she observes.

Sterling is particularly excited to offer participants in this year's Walk the choice between two separate routes and two starting times. "This way more people will be able to walk with us in support of Israel."

The first route departs from the Promenade Shopping Centre at 10:30 a.m. and the second leaves the Bathurst Jewish Centre at 12:30 p.m. Both end at North York Centennial Centre on Finch Avenue where the Community Festival will be held from 11:00 a.m.- 3:30 p.m. The Festival is free and includes continuous live entertainment, carnival games, a petting zoo, virtual reality machines and a Sony Play Station.

Sterling has been a dedicated UJA Federation volunteer for the past seven years and has just recently been installed as Portfolio Coordinator for the 1998 Women's Campaign.

Carole Sterling

But her involvement with community doesn't end at UJA Federation. The rest of her volunteer time is divided between the Kidney Foundation, Leo Baeck Day School and Temple Sinai, where she is a member of the Board of Directors and chairs the membership committee.

A teacher by profession, Sterling is strongly attached to Jewish learning. She is a regular at the Kolel Centre for Liberal Jewish Studies and the Jewish Women's Federation Timeless Treasures Learning Series.

Her thirst for knowledge makes her well suited to manage the Women's Campaign Leadership Development portfolio which she co-chairs with Judy Shulman and Helen Silverstein. "I believe the key to ensuring the legacy of leadership is to provide women with the skills they need."

Israel prepares for landmark anniversary

Diplomatically Speaking

By Jehudi Kinar

The coming year will mark 50 years since the establishment of the independent State of Israel. This is an important landmark for us all and provides a wonderful opportunity for us to look back at what we have accomplished in these 50 short years and to look forward to what we expect will be a very bright future.

It may be worthwhile to recall the important work initiated by the pioneers of modern Zionism in 19th-century Europe. Zionism is a movement which calls for the in-gathering of the Jewish people and is based on a belief in and commitment to the continued existence of the State of Israel as a Jewish State.

The word "Zionism" originates from the biblical word "Zion," which is used synonymously to denote Jerusalem and the Land of Israel. Zionist sentiments were first expressed by Jews yearning for a return to their homeland following their exile to Babylon approximately 2,500 years ago.

Modern Zionism re-emerged in various forms during the 19th century, in large part as a reaction to the anti-Semitic environment in Russia and Eastern Europe, where the hopes for true emancipation and integration were dashed. The Herzlian form of political Zionism should also be seen in the context of the general movement toward liberal nationalism sweeping through Europe at the time.

Aside from the very important political aspects of Zionism which emphasize the return of the Jewish people to an independent Israel, there are a number of other significant factors included as well, among them culture and religion. Of great importance was the revival of the Hebrew language as the official language of Israel.

This year marks 100 years since the first Zionist Congress was convened in Basel, Switzerland. The 1897 conference can certainly be seen as a watershed in the history of the Jewish people; the event ignited the fire of enthusiasm which ultimately led to the establishment of the State of Israel.

The founder of modern political Zionism, Theodor Herzl, frustrated by the many signs of anti-Semitism in Europe and in particular his experience as a foreign journalist in France covering the Dreyfus Affair, looked for a solution that would provide the Jews with the hope for a home of their own. His thoughts were avant-garde and at the time seemed impractical. Today we often sit in amazement at the accuracy of his visions, which seemed nothing short of Utopian when he first published them in Der Judenstaat, The Jewish State.

But now, as we begin preparations for the 50th anniversary celebrations of the State of Israel which will begin at the end of December of this year, we recall with awe the prophetic nature of Herzl's visions.

A country that could only rely on its history, and a very long one at that, finally re-emerged. Once again, Jerusalem, the more than 3,000-year-old capital of the Jewish people, became the capital of Israel. A fact which is often overlooked is that Jerusalem has never been a capital of any country or people other than the Jews and Israel.

Thus, all kinds of surrogate solutions for Jerusalem proposed by outsiders shall not be acceptable to us. Jerusalem shall remain the united capital of Israel and the Jewish people. This however shall not impede any other religion, as freedom of religion shall be maintained and encouraged as has been in the case since 1967.

Looking forward to the future of Israel, we have to look to what Israel has accomplished in the only 50 years of its existence. A population of merely 600,000 as the war of independence broke out in 1948 has grown to approximately 5.5 million. A country dependent on imports of agricultural products has become self-sufficient and is teaching new agricultural methods in Latin America, the Far and Middle East, Africa and in the former Soviet Union and the other East European countries. Immigrants have flooded the country, but this has been and still is a welcome "flood."

Today, Israel is at the forefront of advanced research in the various fields of science and medicine. It is making incredible strides in technology; and is known worldwide for its rich cultural life. The multicultural background and the diversity of its population have contributed to the dynamism of the country.

Tel Aviv mayor opposed to conversion bill

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Roni Milo, the mayor of Tel Aviv, is advising the Knesset to reject a bill designed to formalize the Orthodox rabbinate's monopoly over conversions to Judaism in Israel.

"I am opposed to it," he said flatly in an interview here last week. "It goes against the unity of the Jewish world."

The proposed legislation, which passed first reading on April 1, has been widely condemned, both in Israel and abroad, as a move to delegitimize Conservative and Reform Judaism.

Describing Conservative and Reform Jews in the Diaspora as "very strong supporters of Israel," Milo, a former Likud Knesset member, warned that passage of the proposed legislation would "create hard feelings among devoted Jews."

Declaring that the Conservative and Reform streams of Judaism in Israel should be duly recognized, Milo urged the Orthodox establishment not to try "to impose" its values and traditions on the non-Orthodox Jewish population.

"If the bill is passed, the impact will be negative," he forecast. " It will cause big damage. Who knows what it will be? You can assume we'll have problems."

Milo, who was here on a fund-raising mission on behalf of the Tel Aviv Foundation, cautioned supporters of the proposed legislation to think twice.

But having sounded this alarm, Milo voiced confidence that it would be defeated. As he put it: "The members of the Knesset are not stupid enough to do it."

Milo, a former cabinet minister, is firmly opposed to religious coercion. On Israeli TV recently, he said he would support a consumer's boycott of a Ramat Aviv shopping mall if its owners closed McDonald's restaurant there on the Sabbath.

Ramat Aviv, a middle-class neighborhood, is in north Tel Aviv.

Asked to comment on the budding controversy, Milo observed: "People in Ramat Aviv are secular, not religious. Religious groups should always remember that they can't impose [themselves] on the non-religious. They wouldn't like it if we tried to interfere in their lives. They should let others do what they want.

"I have a lot of respect for Orthodox Jews, but I want them to respect me."

Milo, the mayor since November 1993, cited his city as a paragon of religious tolerance. "That's one of the greatest things about Tel Aviv," he noted. "All the different communities — secular and religious, Jewish and Arab — live together without problems."

Turning to the current deadlock in the peace process, Milo, chair of the World Likud organization, urged Israel and the Palestine Authority to move forward.

Roni Milo

"Peace is very important for us, the Palestinians and the whole region. We have to sit together and talk. The Palestinians should stop terrorism. Peace and terror don't go well together.

"Israel should make efforts to find a better way to negotiate with the Palestinians. We have no choice but to reach peace."

Recalling that the Olso peace process emerged after months of secret talks, he called on both sides to discuss their current differences behind closed doors, in coordination with the United States.

He said he was guardedly optimistic that the peace process would eventually succeed.

But he warned the Palestinians that terrorism, particularly suicide bombings, undermine the cause of peace.

Asked whether Israel should cancel the Har Choma housing project in East Jerusalem as a conciliatory gesture to the Palestinians, Milo said that the government cannot rescind its decision to build there.

A member of Likud's moderate wing and an early advocate of Oslo, he said that support for Har Choma cuts across party lines, with the opposition Labor party also backing it.

Har Choma, he claimed, does not violate any of Israel's agreements with the Palestinians. "Nothing in Olso states that Israel can't build in Jerusalem."

Milo expressed support for Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's plan to plunge into final status talks now with the Palestinians. "It's a good idea. We should try to do it in parallel with the interim accords."

Since Netanyahu still faces the prospect of complicated negotiations with the Arabs, he should secure the services of seasoned advisors, Milo said.

"[Menachem] Begin had a very good team in Camp David, and I think Netanyahu will reach better results with experienced people."

He hastened to add that this suggestion should be taken as advice, not criticism.

Hailing Tel Aviv as a city which never stops, Milo said two of his pet projects are to increase the standard of living in Jaffa and to turn its old port into a centre of entertainment and night life.

Milo said the 18-year-old Tel Aviv Foundation is at present, subsidizing 260 quality-of-life projects in the city. He bristled when he was asked how much money he hoped to raise in Toronto.

David Altman, director-general of the Tel Aviv Foundation, explained it is trying to improve standards in the city's disadvantaged neighborhoods by supporting youth clubs, family medical care facilities, senior citizens' homes and handicapped centres.

CJC region holds 29th annual plenary

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The role of the Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) in uniting the community, even in the face of divisive issues about events in Israel was highlighted at the recent 29th Ontario regional plenary.

Other activities highlighted were advocating — with other ethnic groups — for social equity, defending Jerusalem as the capital of Israel and demanding the speedy trial of war criminals.

Though not referring directly to proposals to curb the role of Congress, regional chair Moshe Ronen, in summing up his two-year stewardship, obviously had this in mind when he reiterated the Congress goals.

Ronen deplored criticism of the Conservative and Reform branches of Judaism. "Let us steer clear of declarations questioning the legitimacy of one or another of our various branches," he said. "To do so is the height of arrogance and conceit."

He said Congress is the guardian of the "politically incorrect," as well as being the champion of small Jewish communities and fighting for the right of Jewish schools to public funding.

But the loudest applause came when he declared that Jerusalem "is the single, united, eternal capital of Israel and the Jewish people."

Ronen said certain circles were objecting to the "Judaization" of Jerusalem. "To speak of the 'Judaization' of Jerusalem makes as much sense as speaking of the 'Judaization' of a synagogue. Jerusalem by its very nature and essence is Jewish, and so it shall forever be.

"This does not in any way preclude that the city, under Israeli sovereignty, always has been and will continue to be fully sensitive to and accepting of all citizens, be they Arab, Jewish, Muslim or Christian. The sharing of Jerusalem's sovereignty, however, is not in the cards.

"On this, we are entitled to receive the world's clear and unequivocal expression of support and understanding, especially from our Christian and Muslim friends, followers of our two sister faiths. Is this too much to ask by a small nation which throughout its history has yearned for Jerusalem?"

Moshe Ronen

CJC, in partnership with UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, has sponsored a working coalition of ethnocultural and faith communities to stress the importance of ethno-specific and faith-specific institutions in social and health service delivery, he said.

In this connection, he added, the decision to shut our own Branson hospital must be reversed, at least in part.

Coalition seeks public funding for schools

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A broad coalition of groups seeking public funding for religious and private schools in Ontario is taking unified political action before the next provincial election.

This was disclosed April 6 by Henry Koschitzky, chair of the Ontario Jewish Association for Equity in Education, at a forum at which one panel member said the groups involved represent 25 percent of the electorate and should show its strength at the polling booth.

"You (Jews) alone have no chance, you must have an alliance," said panel member Mark Holmes, a consultant and retired professor of educational policy at OISE. "With the others you represent a quarter of the electorate. These disparate groups do not have to love each other."

"Let's join hands, then we can force the government to take action," said M.D. Khalid, a Mississauga Islamic school board member. "The money is already there, the public system is using our money and we are being double taxed."

Moderating the forum at a plenary session of the Canadian Jewish Congress (Ontario Region), Koschitzky said the Supreme Court of Canada has ruled against such funding but also declared that the Ontario government has the legal right to provide it.

Though David Moll, a prominent educator, expressed opposition to public funding for religious and private schools, he told the forum that John Snobelen, the Ontario Minister of Education, supports it. "The issue has returned to the political arena,".said Moll, chair of both the Metro and Toronto school boards.

At the same time, Moll said he supports "in principle" that secular education in Jewish schools should be paid for our of the public purse. He gave this opinion when questioned by Simon Rucker, 23, who attended Associated Hebrew Schools, Or Chaim Yeshiva and Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT).

Moll said he did not agree that ethics and values are not getting enough emphasis in the public system.

The coalition includes the CJC Ontario Region, the Ontario Alliance of Christian Schools, the Ontario Multi-Faith Coalition for Equity in Education (Muslim) and the Ontario Federation of Independent Schools.

On the political front, Holmes said on the basis of past action, the NDP should be eliminated, while support from either the Conservative or Liberal parties "will come down to which one will lose less by supporting you. The bottom line is we need votes in the polling booth."

Homes said it was "unrealistic" for the government to support only public and Catholic schools in a pluralistic society.

"There is no ethical reason for discrimination against religions other than Catholicism," he said. "In no country where there is support for religious schools has the public school system collapsed."

Journalist Lois Sweet said though she is no longer a militant public school supporter, and has changed her views 180 degrees on that score, she is still opposed to public funding of religious schools. Instead she believes that religious education and values can be incorporated into the public system.

"The present situation is unfair," she said. "As long as Catholic schools are funded, there should be support for other groups."

She said she was impressed with the "openness" of Jewish day schools, but, on the basis of questioning of their students, she said many feared coming to a larger society from a sheltered environment. Many also said they thought too much emphasis was given to the Holocaust.

Khalid said the cost of educating a student in the Islamic school in Mississauga is $2,500 a year compared with $7,000 in the public system. "Even if we raised the salaries of our teachers to the public level the cost would still be half of the public cost."

Support for public funding of religious and private schools with "a proven track record," was expressed by Paul Fernandes, past chair of the Metro Toronto Separate School Board.

The government has ben extremely unfair to the Jewish community," he said. "Its schools have a track record. I'm quite impressed with the kind of educational system you have put in place."

Holy Blossom to hold seder for those affected by AIDS, HIV

TORONTO — Holy Blossom Temple's AIDS committee would like to invite all its friends to its seventh annual Third Seder: A Passover Celebration For Those Affected and Infected by HIV and AIDS.

This year's seder will be held on April 24, at 6:30 p.m. in the Philip Smith Hall at Holy Blossom Temple, 1950 Bathurst St. There is no charge but donations are appreciated.

A traditional Passover meal will be served and glatt kosher food is available upon request. As well, transportation is available for those who require it.

Last year's seder brought together nearly 350 people to share in a ceremony of redemption and compassion articulated through a distinctive Haggadah that was compiled especially for the occasion by Jonathan Lampe, past chair of the committee.

This year the need is even greater. These mothers, fathers, brothers, sisters and lovers need to know that there is a Jewish community that cares.

For more information, or to make reservations please call Deborah, in confidence, at 789-3291 ext. 249 by April 9.

A Call to Action from Conservative and Reform Jewish Leaders

As leaders of Reform and Conservative Judaism, we are both dismayed and outraged by the decision of Israel's Knesset to try to deter the development of religious pluralism in Israel. At a time when the unity of the Jewish people should be the driving purpose of every responsible Jewish body, the Knesset has decided to fracture that unity by approving the first reading of a bill which denies recognition of non-Orthodox conversions performed in Israel.

We find the vote on the conversion bill difficult to understand and impossible to accept. The Knesset should have welcomed the recent decision of Israel's Supreme Court which created the possibility that the State might finally recognize conversions authenticated by each one of our people's religious streams; instead, the Knesset has chosen to revert to the offensive and exclusivist practice of earlier years. The effort to continue an Orthodox monopoly on conversion and to seek to delegitimize Conservative and Reform Judaism is an insult to our movements and our members: we vigorously protest it.

Accordingly, we have agreed to take the following steps:

1. We urge our 1800 congregations in North America to refrain from welcoming as honoured guests those members of Knesset who support the conversion bill in its final reading. We ask our synagogues to refrain from extending invitations to them to appear as speakers or lecturers, or as guests of honour in our institutions. Furthermore, we ask our congregational leaders to refrain from supporting any communal activity to which such Knesset members have been invited.

   We adopt this policy with great regret. However, we cannot in good conscience include among our honoured guests those who choose to exclude us from the religious community of our people. It is our intention to review this policy every six months.

2. We repudiate any compromise that will affirm the Orthodox stranglehold over conversions in Israel.

3. We call on all those who believe, with us, that there must be greater appreciation of and access to all religious streams in Israel, to contribute even more generously to Reform and Conservative programs and institutions in Israel. It is essential that our members and friends take on themselves the responsibility that the Israeli government has betrayed: the responsibility to encourage all serious forms of Jewish religious expression.

4. As we always have, we strongly encourage our members to contribute generously to their local Federation campaigns. We deeply believe that these campaigns are essential components of our communal commitments. At the same time, we call on our members, and especially those who are active in their local federations, to encourage their federations to provide increased support to Conservative and Reform programs in Israel. And, we continue to press for a reassessment of funding allocation from the Jewish Agency to provide greater resources for our movements, programs and institutions in Israel.

   While we work unceasingly for a change in Israeli policy and to build our movements in Israel, we are prepared to enter all discussions which will enable all religious streams to work together with respect and caring, to strengthen our people's faith and to insure prosperity and well-being for Zion and our people.

Teen leaders visit Toronto in international link

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Pierce Landis

Nava Mizrahi

TORONTO — With his large black velvet kipppah and flowing tzitzit, Pierce Landis, 18, doesn't look like a typical member of B'nai Brith Youth Organization (BBYO).

As the group's grand aleph gadol (international president of BBYO's boys' division, Aleph Zadik Aleph, also known as AZA), the Atlanta teen is, quite literally, one in 40,000, the number of BBYO members worldwide, including some 1,000 Canadians and 19,000 Americans.

While Landis' degree of religious observance may set him apart from fellow members, it's also testament to the inclusive nature of the worldwide organization.

"There's a sense of belonging in BBYO that I haven't felt anywhere else," said Landis' female counterpart, Nava Mizrahi, 18, international n'siah (president) of B'nai B'rith Girls (BBG).

Mizrahi, a native of Vancouver who has received more than a dozen community awards, also likes the fact that the organization is youth-led. "The staff definitely guide us and oversee us, [but] they put us in a position to challenge ourselves and take initiative."

Mizrahi visited Toronto and Montreal recently, as did Landis, to meet with local BBYO chapters, parents of teens and board members. Mizrahi also stopped in Winnipeg.

Both of the teens, who were elected last August at BBYO's international convention in Starlight, Pennsylvania, have deferred university entrance for a year to carry out their full-time organizational responsibilities,

As a Canadian (the fourth to become international BBG president), Mizrahi wants to play a part in "making sure the Canadian regions are attended to."

In the past, Canadian regions have sometimes felt neglected, she noted. Canadian regions fall under the aegis of B'nai B'rith International's office in Washington, D.C., which recently reached out to Canadians by offering them some international programs at Canadian dollar par rates.

This summer for the first time a Chapter Leadership Training Conference, organized through the D.C. office, will be held in Red Deer, Alta. Four locations in the United States will also have conferences.

In Toronto, BBYO funding comes from membership dues, public fundraising and a grant from the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto. B'nai Brith Canada stopped funding BBYO in 1991.

A BBYO summer leadership program several years ago "turned him on to Judaism" and he began studying with a rabbi on his return to Atlanta.

"Pierce is a wonderful influence on the teens," said Stephanie Hofland, director of BBYO's 15-chapter Greater Toronto Area Council, which includes Hamilton and Kitchener.

"People often label me the most religious kid in BBYO," said Landis. "Kids who join BBYO, at least in the United States, often have no Jewish involvement. Our goal is that they'll still be connected to the Jewish people."

BBYO programming typically includes community service, social, educational, Judaic and athletic events.

For Mizrahi, the most striking aspect of a summer leadership training experience was meeting her counterparts from Lithuania and other far-flung locales, and her dual realization of their vast experiential differences as well as a strong feeling of connection with them.

In May and June she plans to meet with chapters in England, Ireland and France. "This is what you live for — being able to motivate youth. I think it's a different type of fulfilment, being able to make a difference in people's lives."

Residents oppose golf course

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Residents in the Bathurst-Sheppard area have won a short reprieve in their battle against a golf course proposed for Earl Bales Park.

Metro Council last week voted to refer the proposal to its environment and public space committee, effectively delaying the plans, but not for long.

Earlier this month, North York Council passed an interim bylaw it says will prohibit any work from proceeding until a study is completed.

The moves follow weeks of opposition to the course from residents in the mainly Jewish area. They were concerned about increased noise and parking, use of pesticides and damage from golf balls.

The 18-hole, par three short course had been planned for 17 acres in the park's southwest area as part of a bid to raise money for Metro, which controls the park. It was estimated the course would cost about $700,000 and bring in up to $200,000 a year.

But opposition arose when residents, many on Timberlane Avenue, charged that Metro had not properly consulted them. They also feared a large chunk of the park's natural beauty would be destroyed.

Ray Biggart, Metro's acting parks commissioner, told The CJN the environment and public space committee will hear submissions from the public later this month, and can kill the plans or send them back to Metro Council with amendments.

Biggart said he wants the course built and he's seeking legal advice on North York's assertion that its bylaw halts the plans. "I think they're wrong," he said.

In the meantime, area residents say they'll keep up the fight. Some told The CJN they remember the time, over 25 years ago, when the York downs Golf and Country Club, on the park's current site, brought noise and broken windows from errant balls.

Allan Eisen, president of the Earl Bales Conservation Association, said his group will make its views known to the Metro committee.

"Why take away a park?" he asked.

Rosalie Abella honored by Bonds, ORT

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Family members, friends and admirers turned out in droves recently to honor Rosalie Silberman Abella, who was awarded the 1997 Woman of Achievement Award by State of Israel Bonds Women's Division and Toronto ORT.

Abella is a justice of Ontario's Court of Appeal and a former judge of the Ontario Provincial Court, family division. In 1995, she chaired the Canadian Judicial Council Conference, the first judicial conference in Canada primarily for women judges, and she was also the sole commissioner on the Royal Commission on Equality in Employment.

As well, she chaired the Study on Access to Legal Services by the Disabled in Ontario. She was presented with the Deborah Award, in recognition of the first female judge and prophet, to whose ideals, the audience was told, Abella strives in contemporary life.

Rosalie Abella

Being a woman and Jewish are her two main identities, Abella told the crowd at Adath Israel Synagogue. In Canada, however, there seems to be a growing number of Jews who seek to be the same as everyone else, who are ambivalent about their Jewishness.

"Many Canadians assume that being Jewish excludes them, and so they abandon their trademark. In the process, [they] have lost their flair — they have traded their uniqueness for the banality of conformity. Canada is enhanced by differences. To exchange uniqueness for integration is cultural suicide. The price for abandoning who we are is cultural invisibility."

Equality guarantees everyone the equal right to be free from discrimination, she said. "To create equality we must acknowledge differences. As a Canadian, I believe that is the single most significant weapon against discrimination."

Being a Jew is many different things, Abella said, and we must allow ourselves to be Jewish in our own way. "The question is not who is a Jew, but why is a Jew? The object should be to reduce intolerance, not increase it in our own ranks. We must be committed to the war against intolerance."

She said that being Jewish "can be a full-time job and to experience it properly, we must know it and participate in [Judaism]. We have made enough progress, not to rest comfortably, but to add a voice as Jews in the rest of Canada."

Public life is global, she said, and "what happens to Jews all over the world should matter to us. Israel is a vulnerable democracy that should be understood. There is a script in the Middle East that is being written one day at a time and the last thing it needs is thousands of directors.

"[Israel] knows better than anyone the truth that all Jews know – nothing and no one can be taken for granted. Israel is part of our future and it needs a strong and understanding Diaspora."

Chair in chemical physics established at U of T

TORONTO — A gift from Roel Buck, Canadian business leader and entrepreneur, will be matched by the University of Toronto (U of T) to establish Canada's first chair in chemical physics.

Paul Brumer, a professor in the chemistry department in the Faculty of Arts and Science and a principal investigator at the Ontario Laser and Lightwave Research Centre, will be the first Roel Buck-Weizmann Professor of Chemical Physics, effective immediately.

Canada has maintained long-standing world leadership in theoretical and experimental chemical physics and two of Canada's three living Nobel laureates — Gerhard Herzberg and U of T chemist John Polanyi worked at the forefront of the field.

Buck is president of RCB Holdings and chair of Autosystems Manufacturing Inc., a manufacturer of motor vehicle parts and accessories.

He has served as president of the Automotive Parts Manufacturers Association and has held positions on other Canadian boards. He is a member of the executive committee of the Canadian Society for the Weizmann Institute of Science.

"People must recognize that we operate in a global community and the only way that Canada can compete in the forefront is in the support of scientific endeavor," says Buck.

The Roel Buck-Weizmann Chair in Chemical Physics builds upon an existing research relationship between U of T and the Weizmann Institute of Science in which Brumer, a graduate of Harvard University, and Professor Moshe Shapiro of the Weizmann Institute are collaborators. They have discovered a laser-based strategy for affecting the outcome of chemical reactions.

Their research has shown that lasers can potentially be used to direct electric currents, make desirable and useful molecules, reduce the production of harmful chemicals and create new sources of laser light. This has opened up possible applications to chemical synthesis, optoelectronics, display panels and pharmaceutical manufacturing.

"Strengthening links between chemical physics research in Canada and Israel presents a unique opportunity to tie together two powerful science communities to mutual advantage," says Marsha Chandler, dean of the Faculty of Arts and Science.

A symposium in honor of the establishment of the Roel Buck-Weizmann Chair in Chemical Physics is planned for May 27.

Jewish writers' style linked to security

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jewish writers have always had difficulty with romantic love stories and they may not resolve that until the political and social future of Jewish people is assured.

That was the message of the Ray D. Wolfe annual lecture delivered recently by Prof. Sharon Green of the Jewish Studies Program at the University of Toronto.

Israeli writers, as well as their counterparts elsewhere, have failed to write romantic novels, veering away from traditional sources and being influenced by modernist trends, said Green, who teaches a course in modern Hebrew literature in translation — the first time it has been offered in the program.

Her lecture, titled Love, Literature and the Jews, S.Y. Agnon and the Search for the Romantic Novel, received an attentive hearing in the University's Croft Chapter House.

Agnon, (1887-1970), winner of the Nobel Prize for literature in 1966, is the only Hebrew writer to have won that prize to date, Green said.

The protagonist in Agnon's A Simple Story, published in 1935, failed miserably in his quest for romantic love, Green said.

One reason for the failure of Jewish writers to treat the subject with success, she suggested, is that for economic and other reasons, Jews were too busy with every-day concerns. She also agreed with an audience member who said that at the time romantic novels were being written by English and other European writers, Jewish marriages were arranged and couples did not know each other.

Another reason may be that Jewish writers had to cover the periods of neoclassicism to modernism in only 70 years, leaving little time for the romantic novel.

As well, the popularity of the romantic novel suffered greatly from the ideas of Marx, Nietzche and Freud, who all influenced the modernist school.

"Where is the equivalent of the Bronte sisters?" she asked.

Prof. David Novak, Jewish Studies Program director, said the lecture honored the memory of a business and communal leader in the community and founding publisher of The CJN. Novak described university chancellor Rose Wolfe as a tireless supporter of the program.

UJA Federation urges cooperation in conversion law debate

TORONTO — UJA Federation is asking everyone involved in the debate about Israel's religious conversion legislation to work together to meet Jewish needs.

Legislation to formalize the status quo of Orthodox conversions and marriages in Israel has passed first reading in the Knesset. The new bill has aroused strong criticism from the Conservative and Reform movements.

The UJA Federation board of directors has endorsed a resolution from the Council of Jewish Federations urging the government of Israel to "abstain from amending legislation or passing any new legislation which would change the current situation regarding recognition of conversions. "It also seeks consultation between the government and the Jewish Agency on any such legislation."

UJA Federation president Sandra Brown stressed that the bill has no impact on the Law of Return, about which many people are concerned. She also acknowledged the "pain and anguish" produced by the debate and called on all parties to the controversy to concentrate on answering the call for help from Jews in need.

"We must work together to alleviate the impact of Jewish poverty, and, in partnership with Jews in Israel and around the world, to rescue people in peril and assist the disadvantaged," she said.

Earlier this year, a statement from the major Conservative and Reform organizations in the United States called on Jewish communities to continue supporting their UJA Federation campaigns. "The vision of klal Israel — a unified Jewish people — is one that has been held by our ancestors for thousands of years," said a statement from The United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism, the Rabbinical Assembly, the Central Conference of American Rabbis and the Union of American Hebrew Congregations.

Toronto student among winners of Mitzvah Competition

[From left] Rabbi Baruch Zaltzman, Leible Ceitlin, Rabbi Yosef Ceitlin.

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO – Leible Ceitlin, a Grade 7 Shmuel Zahavy Cheder Chabad student is one of six winners of the recent International Mitzvah Competition sponsored by the cheder in conjunction with Tzivos Hashem, a worldwide youth organization.

Ceitlin competed against 43 boys from across Canada and the United States, all finalists in a three-month qualifying round that began with 1800 students.

Rabbi Baruch Zaltzman, principal of Shmuel Zahavy Cheder Chabad said that all participating yeshivah students spent their free time studying the 176 mitzvot chosen for this year's competition. The contestants study the details of each mitzvah — its name, its meaning, who is obligated in it and how and when it is performed.

"The process narrowed down to finalists with the most broad and accurate knowledge of the Book of Torah Commandments written by Maimonides over 850 years ago.

"From the efforts these students put into studying, whether during recess or while waiting for the bus...the fact remains that [they all] have gained an incredible storehouse of knowledge that has whet their appetite for a lifetime of Jewish learning," he said.

He knew the week-end of the contest, which included a Shabbat of prayers, songs, meals and special activities, would be a success, said Rabbi Zaltzman, because despite an ice storm in Toronto, all contestants, some from as far away as California, arrived in time.

Shabbat of prayers, songs

"No one got stranded and all arrived before Shabbat. None had ever been to Toronto; so that certainly added to the excitement of the week-end."

Before the final round began, and throughout the afternoon, the capacity crowd at the City Playhouse in Vaughan was entertained by singer Shlomo Simcha.

"We were honored to have such noted rabbis as Binyamin Klein, the Rebbe's personal secretary for 30 years who came from New York as a representative of the Lubavitch head office. Also present were Rabbi Yona Shur, the cheder's executive director; Rabbi Zalman Aaron Grossbaum; and Yehezkel Zahavi, who gave our school money in order to name it after his son Shmuel who was killed in an automobile accident when he was 18 years old," said Rabbi Zaltzman.

York strike is no holiday for students

By SIDURA LUDWIG
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — I've been having problems getting out of bed this week. That's not unusual for university students this time of year. Many stay up all hours getting papers done, cramming for exams, preparing for last minute presentations. To be a red-eyed, groggy, yawning undergraduate is not out of the ordinary.

Opinion

But I'm not overtired and I'm not staying up late. Like many of the other 40,000 students at York University, I am not groggy from feeling overworked. As I write this, my professors prepare for their third week of picketing Tonight, I will once again go to sleep wondering if and when my classes will start up, my papers will be due, my exams will be written. I've been having trouble getting out of bed this week simply because without classes, I'm not sure what I'm getting out of bed for.

The York professors are fighting the administration for a higher wage increase, flexible retirement and smaller classes, and to stop the invasion of technology into the classroom (Internet courses, lectures by TV screens). I would be the first student to say I support them in their fight. What benefits the professors benefits the students: With smaller classes professors will be able to give more attention to students and our work.

I also understand why they chose this time of year to strike. What administration would allow a strike to carry on into April, when final exams need to be written and students are waiting to graduate?

But the strike is carrying on. The administration is digging in its heels. And the students are left feeling like pawns. We're sitting at home, frozen puppets on strings, waiting for the university to turn back on the switch that will let the term continue. We're frozen because, while the university may be stalled, the rest of our lives are not. Students with summer work contracts starting in May worry that they won't be able to take their positions. Students looking for summer work watch the weeks tick by, knowing that every day passing is one day less they have to raise money for next year's tuition. We're frozen like puppets because we have the least amount of control in a situation which most directly affects us.

> 'We're frozen like puppets'

Passover is right around the corner and as a Jewish student, I face an extra dimension in this strike. My mother in Winnipeg counts the strike as a mixed blessing. While of course she hates to see my year interrupted, on the other hand, she has promised to bug me every day the strike continues.

"If it goes on," she says, "you could come home for the seders."

But I can't even consider making those plans. With my luck,I'd step on the plane and have to turn right around, after finding out in mid-flight that the the strike had been settled.

I have one roommate, who, after completing her first year was very much looking forward to spending the holiday with her family in Houston. Now it looks as though exams will be extended into May and she will have to stay here and spend another holiday away from home.

In many ways, my roommates and I are fortunate. We're not faced with a lease ending in May or with meal plans budgeted only until the end of term.

At the same time, we have to start preparing for the coming of Pesach, for the cleaning, the shopping, the organizing. Not knowing when this strike will end means not knowing when we may have to drop everything to dive back into school and exams at a moment's notice. I want to be able to enjoy the holiday without feeling as though I am on call.

> Pesach a time of rebirth

Pesach is one of the four Jewish new years. Marking the coming of spring, it is a time of regeneration, rebirth and growth. The end of term should also mark the beginning of a new year — the completion of one academic year allowing students to carry new knowledge and skill into the following. Yet here we are in a stalemate position. We're not being allowed to grow, even as we are being denied access to our education.

People keep asking me how I'm enjoying my holiday. I would hardly call it that. I'm not in classes, but I'm also in no position to let myself believe that those classes don't exist. If I let myself believe that this is holiday time, then I'm in for a rude awakening.

With a holiday, one knows when it begins and when it ends, but I'm going to wake up one morning and just as suddenly as my classes stopped, so will they start up. Just as I was given this "holiday" without warning, so will I have it ended.

I didn't need a strike to know the importance of my professors' work. I want them to feel appreciated and recognized for their knowledge, skills and effort. But at the same time, I also need to be recognized, not as a pawn, but as someone waiting for these strings to be cut.

CJC to meet Rock over war crimes allegations attached to the unit. Hobson's charges included that Fradkin was also suspected of downplaying the case of suspected war criminal Radislav Grujicic of Windsor, Ont., because Grujicic was not accused of killing Jews.

Hobson, now a legal consultant in Metro Toronto, said a decision was made by senior Justice Department officials to proceed with criminal charges against suspects rather than take the relatively easier route of denaturalization and deportation. He said his protests were ignored and that criminal charges remained the preferred route until Rock took over in 1993, when Ottawa reversed its anti-deportation policy.

It was under the watch of Hobson and Fradkin that Canada's only successful deportation came in 1992, when convicted Nazi collaborator Jacob Luitjens was sent to face charges in his native Holland.

Hobson, who maintains he was forced out of the war crimes unit, said more successful deportations could have taken place if the criminal route had been abandoned earlier.

The Justice Department says it conducted a preliminary investigation into the charges of anti-Jewish bias in 1990, but that a formal inquiry did not take place because Fradkin had not filed a grievance.

Fradkin told The CJN last week he could not comment because he's still employed by the Justice Department as senior counsel in the civil litigation section.

Irving Abella, chair of CJC's war crimes committee, said a May 5 meeting has been scheduled with Rock to discuss the matter.

Abella said meetings with Thomson and senior Justice Department lawyers will take place in the next two weeks. He said CJC wants an independent inquiry to probe the charges of anti-Semitism and to find out why a formal investigation into them was not carried out years ago.

For his part, a frustrated Hobson told CJC's Ontario region plenary last week that his years in the war crimes unit have made him "mad as hell and not going to take it anymore."

Offer rejected

"I've had enough," said Hobson, who said he was told by senior bureaucrats to stop leaving paper trails and, it was implied, to stop making matters more difficult for then justice minister Kim Campbell.

Hobson said he's offered his services to the government for free, but that Ottawa rejected his offer.

CJC and B'nai Brith Canada reacted with outrage to Hobson's allegations. BBC said it was "appalled" to discover that "one of the strongest barriers" to prosecutions was anti-Semitism.

As for Kisielaitis, CJC says U.S. officials developed an "ironclad" case against him after he was discovered in 1983 living in Worcester, Mass.

Congress says Kisielaitis came to Canada in 1948 and moved to the United States in 1962. It says he returned to Canada two days before his American deportation hearings were to begin in May, 1985.

Somalia inquiry's termination part of 'cover-up,' BBC says

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

OTTAWA — The government's premature termination of the Somalia inquiry is part of a "cover-up" of events that took place in the African nation, B'nai Brith Canada (BBC) has charged.

The Defence Department cut off the inquiry to prevent the commission from getting at the truth "because the truth had become just too embarrassing to the department and the minister," lawyer David Matas said last week in BBC's submission to the inquiry.

Matas advised the commission to address why Ottawa cut short the inquiry and "record as closely as possible exactly what work was frustrated by its premature termination," which he called "the latest sordid chapter in this awful history."

Both BBC and Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) were granted standing before the inquiry to examine racism in the military, especially among Canadian peacekeepers in Somalia in the early 1990s. CJC's brief, also submitted last week, proffered a long list of recommendations to combat the problem.

Matas said BBC considered dropping out to protest Defence Minister Doug Young's decision to cut short the commission, but decided to carry on "out of respect" for its work and potential effectiveness.

Matas slammed the Defence Department for delaying the commission's work in the first place by withholding and destroying documents, and "untimely disclosure....When it comes to racism in the Armed Forces, the Minister of Defence just does not want to know."

What started out as the killing of two Somali teenagers under the watch of Canadian peacekeepers, ended up discrediting the entire military establishment and the minister, Matas told the commission.

The "only good" that came out of the episode was the appointment of the inquiry. By cutting its mandate short, the minister, the Armed Forces and the Defence Department, made "their disgrace total."

BBC's most important recommendation is that the Armed Forces "develop a human rights culture," Matas said. The main victims of human rights violations "are minority members of the Canadian military itself, and not outsiders...For the Canadian military in Somalia, there was not even a suggestion of a need for equality of treatment" for minorities and Somalis.

"Given the absence of a human rights culture within the military, the Somalia deployment was a tragedy waiting to happen. And it will happen again and again in other, similar peacekeeping operations unless the military gets its human rights act together."

When the Canadian military violates the rights of Somalis, "that violation is a threat to the human rights of the Jewish minority in Canada," Matas said.

He noted that the military's exclusion of Jews from Middle East peacekeeping operations is still before the courts. In BBC's view, that issue and the mistreatment of Somalis "have the same genesis: lack of military commitment to human rights values; and they have the same solution: an internalization of the universal values of human rights."

Steven Shulman and Keith Landy of CJC offered the inquiry the following recommendations:

• Vigilance in attacking racism: "None is too many when it comes to racists, racism and racist incidents in the Armed Forces... Canadians expect and deserve no less."

• Better internal and external communications about racists: It is vital, Congress said, that information gathered by all sectors of the Forces be shared with commanding officers and with other branches of government.

• Enhanced mandatory education about racist ideology, groups, symbols and language: Individuals "at every level" in the military failed to recognize evidence of racists, racist beliefs, symbols and/or language, CJC charges. The inquiry heard evidence of skinheads, neo-Nazis and white supremacists in the ranks, as well as the display of the U.S. Confederate flag and Celtic and Iron crosses; the discovery of a Ku Klux Klan membership card; racist language and swastika tattoos. CJC took the military to task for its failure to act on these, and indeed, its indifference to them. CJC recalled that one high-ranking officer testified that in his nearly 30 years in the military, he had seen "many" Iron Crosses and swastika tattoos on soldiers "who are not racists."

• Uniform recruiting safeguards against the enrolment of racists in the Armed Forces must be instituted. Additional screening should take place to ensure soldiers are fit to take part in peacekeeping missions abroad. At the time of the Somalia deployment, the Forces did not have a mechanism in place to weed out racists. CJC said one "violent" soldier, who has admitted membership in the Aryan Resistance Movement, is still a Forces member.

• Prior to peacekeeping missions, a priority should be the "sensitization" of personnel to "the cultural milieu of the country or region" of deployment.

• The ultimate goal of Canadian Forces' policy should be "zero tolerance" for racism. With that in mind, a 1993 Forces order stating that racist behavior is unacceptable can be improved, CJC suggests, by codifying standard punishments for racists acts.

PM backs pull-out

OTTAWA — Prime Minister Jean Chretien has reaffirmed Canada's support for UN resolutions calling for the eventual pull-back of Israeli troops from southern Lebanon.

Chretien made the remarks last week following his meeting with visiting Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik Hariri.

"Everybody wants peace in the area," Chretien said. "It's desirable for the whole world, and if we can make a contribution, we'll be there to make it."

Malachamavis

By LILA JULIUS

"I don't want to die in winter...standing outside in the cold and rain...it would be too hard on the children."

We were huddled under blankets on the corner cots in Dora's TV room. She had just come home from the hospital and I'd run in from next door to sit with her, to wait out another power failure in that winter of endless rain.

"I want to die when everyone's happy...sunshine...flowers. Around Pesach would be good!" She spoke with enthusiasm.

"This Pesach?" I teased. It was only a few months before the Passover holiday.

"I didn't say which Pesach." Dora laughed and shook her finger. She tucked the blankets around her a little tighter. Her leathery face took on a pensive look. "But what can I do? she mused. "When Malachamavis comes for me, I'll have to go with him." I'd never heard this pronunciation. She made the name sound friendly.

"Where do you think he'll take you?" I asked.

Dora shrugged, her mouth crinkling into a smile. "Do I know? Up to heaven."

"Maybe you'll go back to where you were, in the time before you were born."

"Where was I before I was born?" she whispered, more to herself than to me. She lay back on the pillow smiling, her eyes closed. Her face took on the brightness of a young girl's, her complexion looked smooth and creamy.

Dora sat up, making plans. "When the winter's over, I'll go to Nazareth to buy my son-in-law a calf's leg. Do you like calf's leg?" Hiding my displeasure, I told her I'd never tasted the dish. "Oh, but it's so good. The way I make it is his favorite. I'll make some for you too." She licked her lips.

I was reminded of the summer day we were standing in the street and somehow got on to "the purpose of life." "Oh," her smile was mischievous. She stretched her hand towards the hills and orchards said, "It's for going about outdoors and looking at this, and looking at that."

The winter passed in our temperate valley with its unprecedented rains. It had even snowed. Then came Pesach pulling its load of scarlet poppies and yellow field marigolds. The neighbor's goats kicked their heels in the wild mustard and I left for Jerusalem to spend seder night with my children. When I got back. Dora was standing on the road. She threw her arms around me, kissing my cheeks. I put down my shopping baskets and we hugged each other. "My fridge is empty," I told her and rushed off to the grocery.

Kicked their heels in the wild mustard

The following morning Dora's grandson knocked at my door, told me that she was dead. The funeral was scheduled for just before sundown. We looked at each other in shock. After he left, I did a calculation. Tomorrow would be the last day of the week-long holiday, a festival day on which mourning is forbidden. After that came the Sabbath, another day in which mourning's prohibited. I was stunned. I wanted to shout, "You schemer. You planned it all. Your prayers were answered!"

It was several months before I felt the impact of my loss, how much I missed her. Through my kitchen window I look out on Dora's house. When I do, I am touched by her loving nature. I also think about Malachamavis, how we know when it's time to die, time to be born. The angel inside us.

A Survivor's Dilemma

By JOSEPH PERETZ

We both jumped up when the doorbell rang. Our nerves had been on edge since the newspaper reported that the first survivors of the liberated death camps had started to trickle back. Full of anticipation, I rushed to the front door.

I hope that the disappointment did not show in my face. It was not a relative, but neverthless, I was overjoyed to see a familiar face from the past. The eyes set in the gaunt face were the same. The hair on his shaven head had started to grow back. His clothes hung on his emaciated body. But there was no doubt: it was Sam, Sam Lipchitz, an old friend from our Maccabi youth group before the war. He embraced Josie who pulled him inside and immediately busied herself preparing a meal for our visitor.

He had been released from the DP camp in Germany the previous day. Upon his arrival in Antwerp, he had stopped at the Kleinblatt bakery down the street, which had just reopened. There he found out that Josie and I had survived and recently married. His hope of finding out about more survivors had brought him to our door.

After hungrily wolfing down his meal, he asked if we could put him up for the night. He had nowhere else to go. He was anxious to go to Brussels early the next morning, to arrange for papers to have a Polish girl released from the displaced persons camp in Germany and have her come to Belgium. Seeing the curious looks on our faces, he told us his tale.

In the spring of 1942, he married Magda, a German refugee who had managed to escape her native Berlin just before the outbreak of the war and had found sanctuary in Antwerp. Six months later, Magda was arrested during a raid on the train to Brussels. She had taken off the yellow Star of David in the hope of finding a safe haven in the Belgian capital for her and Sammy, as she lovingly called him.

Three months later, he was picked up in the course of a raid on their street and shipped to the infamous kazerne Dossin in Mechelen. His hope of being reunited with Magda was in vain. She had been shipped to the east in a transport two days before his incarceration. A few months later, when he came to Auschwitz after a subsequent transport, an acquaintance who had been on the same transport as Sam's wife, told him he had seen Magda go into the gas chamber soon after her arrival.

His grief was attenuated by the thought that, at least, she did not suffer long. He, himself, managed to survive thanks to his trade. Tailors were exempt from the backbreaking slavery in the stone quarries. They worked inside, sheltered from the elements.

'Something familiar struck me'

Some days it was his task to get the food from the kitchen for his work group. That is where he first met Yanka, the Polish girl. She only spoke Polish, of which he understood a few words, and they communicated in broken German. Like him, she wore the striped prison uniform. Both had their heads shaven but he thought that she had the most beautiful eyes, which lit up when she smiled. They took a liking to each other. Yanka looked forward to the days when Sam picked up the tailors' rations and would give him an extra piece of bread she stole from the kitchen.

In 1944, Sam was striken with typhus. When Yanka found out, she managed to pull a gold crown from her teeth and to barter it in the camp's clandestine black market for medication that she was able to get to Sam, thus saving his life. After he recovered, she nurtured him back to health, stealing whatever food she could lay her hands on.

When at last they were liberated by the Red Army and transported to a displaced persons camp in Germany, their romance blossomed. She refused to return to Poland. Sam asked her to marry him as soon as he was able to secure papers for her to join him in Belgium and she eagerly accepted.

It was almost morning when he stopped talking. After a couple hours of sleep and a quick breakfast, Sam left.

A week went by before he came back, looking even more haggard than before.

I'll let him tell you the rest of the story in his own words.

"When I arrived in Brussels, I set out for the Red Cross building, located a few blocks from the station. There was already a bit of a line-up in the spacious hallway of the place.

"Standing in line, I observed the backs of the people in front of me. Something in the bearing of a woman in the line caught my eye. Something familiar struck me. The tilt of her head. Her slender, elongated neck. No, it was not possible. She was dead. I knew she was dead. As if by mental telepathy, she turned around. Her eyes widened as they met mine. Her lips opened. Her voice broke, whispering my name. Magda! It was her, my Magda!

"We flew into each others arms. As I held her, sobbing, to my chest, stroking her back, my mind went back to Yanka.

"Poor Yanka, what will become of you now?"

WALKING WITH DAD

Hand in hand,
we're timeless walkers,
footsteps easy
amid yellow flowers, brown rocks.

Past the golfers on the hill,
there's a coffee shop where you can eat chocolates and while away half an hour.

"It's picturesque," I say, and make you happy to have fathered
a child of words:
five or six I am,
and peace shines down
the whole path.

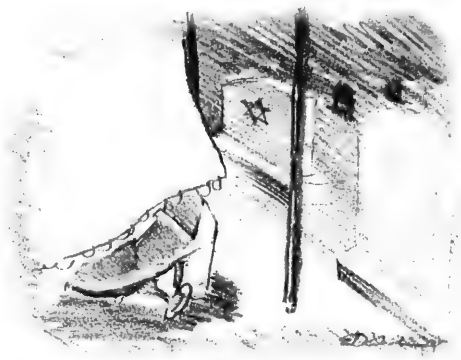
A wedding in a cemetery

By ARIEH OFSEYER



It happened after four years of war, revolution, pogroms and hunger. A typhus epidemic broke out throughout Europe. Antibiotics had not then been invented. Most doctors had been conscripted into the army, very few remained for the civilian population. The disease spread rapidly. Hospitals were filled beyond capacity. The toll was terrible.

I took sick then. The doctor my parents brought to our home said what he said, wrote what he wrote, but he didn't promise any miracles. They took care of me at home because there was no room in the hospital. My mother left her work in our store and devoted her days and nights to me.

My condition grew progressively worse, until I reached a crisis. My mother hurried to the synagogue. The sexton opened the Holy Ark for her, and she sobbed with a broken heart and begged for mercy.

The epidemic claimed victims without end. People wandered about downcast. The rabbis and community leaders consulted together trying to find some way to stem the tide of the epidemic. After lengthy deliberations they decided upon a most unusual proposal; to fulfil a great mitzvah.

Poor orphans

The mitzvah involved finding two orphans from among the most poor of our people and marrying them to each other, at midnight, in the Jewish cemetery.

It was not at all difficult to find such a couple since there was no lack of poor orphans in our community.

One day they announced in the town that the wedding would take place on Monday night just as it was set to became Tuesday, the day on which "It is good" was mentioned in the creation story. The entire community was invited to participate in fulfilling this mitzvah.

The musicians with their old instruments were invited. New clothes were made for the bride and groom.

The rabbis of the city arrived at the synagogue on the appointed day dressed in their holiday garb. The marriage procession would begin from the synagogue.

I was still sick. As a result I was unable to participate in the ceremony. But my parents did. Afterwards they told me what had happened.

Many people gathered to fulfil the mitzvah of "causing the bride and groom to rejoice," with the thought that the merit of this good deed would save them from the plague.

At the head of the procession marched the musicians, after them the rabbis, followed by the bride and groom. On both sides of them walked the leaders of the town, followed by the masses of townsfolk, black candles in the hands of many of them.

I remember so vividly how, from my bed, I heard the sad melodies of the band and how fear filled my heart as I thought about a marriage ceremony in the cemetery, in the darkness of night. We had grown up surrounded by foolish beliefs that we heard in cheder and outside of it. We were terrified of the dead that arise from their graves at midnight and go to pray in the synagogue. We were frightened of the ghosts, of the evil spirits. Not only was the procession going to the cemetery, but they were going at the most dangerous time. All of this in order to fulfil the most joyous act in the life of a young couple, for the sake of saving the entire Jewish community.

At the cemetery the chupah had been set up. The cantor, Reb Moishe, began the traditional ceremony. One of the rabbis read the ketubah, and the groom put the ring on the bride's finger and recited the traditional blessing "Be Thou Consecrated Unto Me." They brought the wine and made the blessing. The lights of the candles cast heavy shadows.

People stood clinging together

The people stood clinging together in fear of the dark, the awsomeness of the occasion, and in the need of a miracle. Their eyes were cast heavenward in prayer, their hearts, broken. The musicians played, and tears glistened in all the upraised eyes.

The cantor broke the glass. The people were startled out of their petrified state and cried out: "Mazel Tov! Mazel Tov!"

Tears coursed down the face of the bride, onto her new dress. She did not even know the groom. The bitter lot of her impoverished life had brought her to this, to this "wedding." The groom too, in his innocence, prayed with a broken heart for a "life in which there would be no embarrassment."

The crowd broke up into small groups. Everyone went together. Fear was upon them all. The community prepared a room for the couple, and the sexton escorted them to it.

After many days the plague broke. I, too, recovered.

There were those who believed, that the wedding in the cemetery on that night, arranged at a time of mercy, was the reason for the plague coming to an end.

I never found out what happened to the two orphans after their wedding in the cemetery.

REACHING FOR THE DARK

Sometimes at night, time becomes fluid and lets me ride on it backwards like a silky river bearing me past events that were not mine.
1940 in the ghetto of Krakow, for instance
when my young uncle of whom there are no photos scaled the wall in his fifteenth year,
my father's brother,
never mentioned at home,
whose story I learned elsewhere, lobbed a grenade at some German soldiers who promptly shot him without a thought.

Sometimes at night
the ageless faceless figure stoops in silhouette against the immutable ghetto wall, reaching for the dark current that brings him to me.

Baby carriage for sale - never used

By GEORGE I. BERNSTEIN

As any Science major who has dabbled in Quantum Mechanics knows, Bell's Theorem of non-locality and inequality is the weirdest hunk of mathematics that ever bashed a coffee-drenched student's neurons at 2 a.m. before a term final.

Electrons and subatomic particles that formed the tiny spheres of super-energy and exploded during the "Big Bang" formation of the universe, even though now separated by billions of light years, are still in some way mysteriously interconnected. In effect, what happens at this instant in the spiral galaxy M82, 10 million light years from earth, can influence the lean of the Leaning Tower of Pisa, right now. Who knows if some day the tower will fall because of a hiccup on M82. Quantum theory also states that no subatomic particle can be precisely located, except as a probability wave.

Electron Alpha Sigma, a few weeks ago, casually observed her celestial calendar as she did once every billion years. The search required several seconds as she scanned dates from the edge of infinity to the outer limits of space. Horror-stricken, she realized that a tragic event would soon occur — an event that could happen only once in 10 billion years; a revelation that on December 15, 1992, on planet Earth in the Sun's solar system wedged into the edge of the

A revelation

Milky Way Galaxy, tragedy would strike at a latitude and longitude precisely intersecting in Robbie's bedroom at 602 Sunset Ave. at 3 a.m., Universal Time. In effect, all oxygen molecules would crowd into the north-east corner of the bedroom, leaving the rest of the room oxygen-depleted.

Electron Alpha Sigma, herself a mother of several billion electrons, spun out of orbit with agitation, in order to attract God's attention and alert Him to the impending disaster.

God immediately contacted his chief oxygen molecule, 0:Maurice and demanded a full explanation. It is not general knowledge, but top brass oxygen molecules can converse with God in extreme emergencies.

God said, "Look here 0:Maurice, I know you take these probability things very seriously, but can't you aggregate over the Pacific or the North Pole so no one gets hurt? After all, we have a lot of room in Our ballpark."

0:Maurice, ever impudent since his stellar performance in the "Big Bang," replied, "With due respect God, Sir, You of all people know that the laws of Your Universe are absolute, and I might add, perfect. If one atom veers from its probability wave for a micromillisecond, the whole universe would self-destruct. By doing my job, Sir, I'm really saving Your neck. I mean, Your miracles, You know, were OK for the Bible, but now, Sir, we're in the real world."

So Robbie died at 3 a.m., Universal Time. The doctor called it a crib death.

When God looked down and saw how Robbie's parents wept so bitterly during shivah, He realized that 0:Maurice had carried things too far and He would have to punish him, However 0:Maurice was alerted to God's anger by terrible tremors shaking the whole universe and figured he was in deep trouble. So 0:Maurice jumped on a probability wave that carried him into the deep recesses of the Orion nebula and there he would hide for eternity.

And as Cain could not hide from God, so 0:Maurice could not hide either.

An astronomer working late at the great Palomar Observatory, dozed off at her control panel of the giant 200-inch reflecting telescope, sitting on the Summit of Mount Palomar. She awoke with a start from a weird dream in which a voice told her to immediately focus the telescope into the exact midpoint of the Orion nebula.

This observation kicked 0:Maurice off a tiny asteroid from which he was clinging and cringing in fear.

Although Prof. Jessica Morgan, of course, did not see 0:Maurice, she was almost blinded by celestial explosion, an explosion seen vividly by every observatory on Earth.

A Black Hole was thus created swallowing 0:Maurice, squashing his electrons and nucleus into a primeval soup as he was hammered into another universe ruled by a Mephistophelian nothingness.

Shortly thereafter, Robbie's parents were blessed with a son and daughter, twins, called Adam, after the first man, and Eve, after the first woman. They knew that God would now protect their children.

And so He did.

TODAY'S TOMORROW

Life's gyrations put our world in a spin
Corruption prevails, the yetzer hara might win.
Is it any wonder, the guides are perplexed
Can we not feel, the people are vexed?

Man lives by instinct, man lives by need
From generation to generation, from seed to seed.
Do we do, what we do, how we do, to get by
Thus the collective evokes that soundless, sigh.

Decisions, like flotsam in the sea's path
Float to the surface of life's aftermath.
Yet the swirl can break if we make our amends
For burgeoning beginnings make the best ends.

Lessons learned from Avraham and Sora
Strengthen our faith, our belief in the Torah
To ride out the crest of these troubled ages
By retaining the wisdom espoused by our sages.

Let's reach the ideal of an eirlicha mentsch
Who with hands on children makes solemn bentsch.
By making this core richer and blessèd
Lives are enhanced by our caring and chesèd.

So let's all remember just who we are
Whether right or left, near or far.
Together, as Jews, the future is unfurled
To bring joy, and laughter, and sense to our world.

Mr. Plotnik

By PHILIP EINSTOSS

When Mr. Plotnik thought he wouldn't be able to take it anymore because his head would burst into two evenly formed pieces he told his wife he was leaving for a walk and that she should save her yelling because there wouldn't be anybody there to listen.

"Where do you think you're going?! It's Shabbos soon!" she cried, waving around a chicken that looked at the world with crazy eyes. But Mr. Plotnik just waved his hand at her and left. True, she followed him halfway down the path from their front door to the old old fence that he was too lazy to fix, or so she said, yelling so loudly that their neighbors were sticking their heads out their windows including Mrs. Goldbloom who was heard to say, enough already enough, she should leave him already. But all the commotion wasn't enough to stop Mr. Plotnik and before even he knew it, he was on the dusty road in the countryside smelling the trees and flowers and caring about nothing that could be thought.

After walking a distance Mr. Plotnik discovered a place so pleasing it made him want to stay and the place was this: a brook that could be heard before seen and when seen was small and bending and cut through green and dark crumbly earth and was sheltered by great trees that seemed to have taken it upon themselves to protect, and here Mr. Plotnik chose to rest.

Mr. Plotnik lay his body down and soon before he knew it, he was asleep and not until the middle of the night when an owl made its hoot did he wake. He was startled at first because he didn't know where he was and he rubbed his eyes and then he remembered the yelling and leaving his wife and also that it was Shabbos. "Aiyy," Mr. Plotnik said with some passion and hit himself in the forehead.

Now it was true that Mr. Plotnik wasn't what one would call a religious man, and it was also true that he had once attended a meeting of the Bund when they had come to his village on a recruiting drive. But there was still tradition, and on Shabbos a woman should not be without her husband and a husband should not be sitting in a forest.

But when Mr. Plotnik got up and made himself ready to head back he didn't know which way he should go and he had to admit to himself that he was in fact, lost.

After several moments of deep anxiety where Mr. Plotnik did nothing but tremble, he started to think and he concluded the following: there were two options, option number 1 stay where he was and wait until morning when he'd be better able to figure out how to get home; and option number 2 start right away in a direction and hope for the best. Since it was turning colder and even starting to rain Mr. Plotnik decided to go with option number 2 and off he went, though it is true without much confidence.

Mr. Plotnik decided to proceed along a path where the forest seemed less dense but the less dense part didn't last very long and soon he was in woods that were thick with bushes and shrubs and vines that hung down to his nose. He decided to turn around and retrace his steps back to where he started but after marching for who knows how long he was still in thick forest. Mr. Plotnik was convinced that he was even more lost than before and he cursed himself for not going with option number 1 and he was certain that any moment he'd walk right into a pack of wolves and all that would be left of him would be his hat.

Mr. Plotnik got down on his knees and started to pray "Please God, I swear on my life that I will never leave my wife like this again, that I will be a better husband and work harder, that I will throw away my philosophy books and go back to the shop and sew buttons and mend garments and make a living."

"Hullo! Who's there?!

It was a voice, a voice. Could it be God himself?

"Is somebody there?" the voice asked again.

God certainly sounded familiar. Almost like Goldman.

"I'm asking again, is anybody there?"

It was Goldman. That voice could belong to no one but him.

Mr. Plotnik ran from Goldman's voice, crashing wildly through the underbrush, looking occasionally back to see if he was being followed, and on one of those occasions when he was looking backwards instead of forward who should he run into but Goldman himself.

The two of them tumbling and Mr. Plotnik landed right in front of Goldman, staring into the dressmaker's bloodshot eyes.

"But, but you're dead Goldman."

"Dead shmed. Do I look dead? Do I look dead?!" Goldman grabbed Mr. Plotnik by the lapels. "Nu?!"

"Then if you're not dead, where have you been all this time?"

"Lost! Lost in this forest. Just like you."

"Aiyy!" Mr. Plotnik hit himself on the forehead. That meant Goldman who he thought had been dead for more than five years had really

Remembering an ordinary man

By IBOLYA GROSSMAN

The memory of those who died will stay alive as long as we remember them. They are gone forever when there is nobody to think of them any more.

Over 50 years have passed since the Nazi hordes took away 600,000 Hungarian Jews marked for death. There is no tombstone for any of them, but we don't need a tombstone to remember them, because their memories live in our hearts.

I especially remember a plain, ordinary man. He was one of the millions who was born, grew up, became a family man, got old and finally died. What could I say about such a simple man who was not a politician, scientist or artist, only one of the every day men who made up the majority of the population. Nevertheless, I would like to write about him because I knew and loved that man.

He was very handsome in his younger years: I saw some pictures. He had black hair, blue eyes and a perky moustache. When I first became acquainted with him, he was already in his middle age. He was slightly built with greyish black hair and trusting blue eyes and he was always cheerful. The man was blessed with an optimistic personality. In addition to his good humor he was always ready to help those in need.

Not highly educated

Ignacz — that was his name — was not highly educated because his family was poor and couldn't afford to send him to high school. But education is not everything. Honesty, kindness and a good heart sometimes have more value than scholarship. He liked children and told me lots of stories about his boyhood and younger years, stories I liked very much to listen to.

One of my favorites that I recall was a funny story. As a young man, Ignacz wandered from village to village looking for a job. Sometimes he ran out of money. Once when he had no money left, he knocked on a door in a small village asking for food. Probably he didn't look like a beggar, because the little girl who opened the door for him ran to the inner room shouting "Mother come quickly there is a gentlemanlike beggar in the doorway."

Russian soldier

Another of his stories that I still remember was so sad, that as a little girl, I cried when I heard it. It happened during World War I. The enemies were in hand-to-hand combat. Ignacz faced a Russian soldier; both had bayonets drawn. Our man was a split second faster and stabbed the enemy. But when the Russian fell back with a scream of "Shemah Yisrael" Ignacz was shocked and had tears in his eyes. "I killed a Jew," he whispered. But it was war and he would have been the one killed if the other soldier had been faster.

Finally Ignacz stopped wandering around, settled down and got married. Unfortunately his wife died and Ignacz became a widower with two little girls on his hands, girls four and eight years of age. The only solution for him was to get married again. A year after his wife's death, he was introduced to a woman who was not very young — in her mid-30s — and was willing to marry him and take on the responsibility of being a stepmother to the girls.

They moved to a bigger city where he opened a tinsmith shop. They also bought a small family house. After that, the babies were born one after another. Two of them died in infancy, but three girls survived. With the two girls from the first marriage, he had five to raise and then give away in marriage. The family had a very hard time during World War I and the years of the Depression that followed.

The parents struggled for their daily existence to provide their large family a living and Ignacz didn't have much enjoyment in his life. One of his pleasures was his pipe, which I never saw him without. He also lit a cigar once a week, since he couldn't afford it every day. On his birthday or other special events, he always got a few good cigars as a present from his family and saved them for Sundays. And Sunday afternoons were his special treat when he went to the city's coffeehouse for his card games. Occasionally at his wife's request, he went for a picnic with his family.

I often went to his shop for a chat and I liked to watch him work. He made cans, buckets, cake pans and other household items from tin. The whole city knew him because of his honesty, integrity and diligence.

The years passed and the two oldest girls got married. More debt again, to give them dowry. The father's hair became whiter and he looked so nice with his trusting blue eyes. And how proud he was of his daughters! If somebody praised them or they got good report cards in school, their father's eyes shone with tears. Years later, the third daughter got married and moved to Budapest. When the fourth girl got older, she moved to Budapest also, where she worked made a living for herself and soon married her childhood sweetheart. The youngest daughter married at age 19 and stayed home for a while. But before World War II broke out, she too moved to the capital city.

Life became more complicated

The parents sold their house and rented a small apartment near their shop. Their lives became a bit easier and more carefree because the expenses for only the two of them were a lot less. But their happiness was short lived.

World War II broke out and the father, mother and two older sisters with their families were deported, together with the city's more than 4,000 Jews. Because Ignacz never stopped believing that tomorrow is going to be better than today, he didn't believe, even in the sealed cattle car, that their lives were in any danger.

The Nazis killed them all in Auschwitz. The date on which they were deported was July 4, 1944. The city where they lived and were taken from was Pecs, the capital of the province, Baranya, Hungary.

The simple, good hearted, hard working man, with his snow white hair and trusting blue eyes was my father, my dear old father!

Barrels of Passover Memories

Years ago, barrels were a favourite means of storing the Passover dishes, pots, glasses and cutlery. Each piece was wrapped carefully in newspaper.

Everybody had barrels. After all, everyone made their own wine and old barrels were plentiful and withstood a year's storage and punishment in basements.

Each Passover, the family would gather to unwrap each barrel's contents and relive the memories of past generations. Treasured pieces brought from Europe were discussed and a link with the past forged.

GOD'S LEFT HAND MAN

In the heat of the scorching sun
Noah found a spot 'neath a vine-grove.
Fell into a deep sleep.

"What are you planting?" Satan asked
"A vine" quothe Noah,
"And what is that?"
"A vine has fruit from which man makes wine that fills the heart with joy."

"Come, let us taste this wine."
"Not so fast!" said Noah. "Oh yes, you can eat the grapes to your hearts content, but to make wine...that takes time. Besides your reputation is notorious...G-d would not approve my friendship with you."

"Ha!" Satan gave forth a burst of laughter
"Don't you know I'm G-d's Left Hand Man?
I take care of His sinners
Am I less than your animals?"

"Come with me where my wine is stored" said Noah, "We will drink together though my wine might make you heady."

"Don't worry my friend...I'm willing to try new tricks, new tastes...If you say it brings joy to the heart...I may convert to an angel."

They toasted "Life." "Wine." "Friendship."
Satan smacked his lips. "How sweet it is."
They became frisky dancing into the night.
Light-headed, dizzy, they fell in a heap on the earthen floor.

Late that evening, Noah's wife wondered why her husband had not come home. She searched for him amongst the graves. Found him fast asleep.
She shook him many times...ran to the well, filled her bucket with water and poured it over him.

"Wake up! you sleeper in the dust... waster of time...Who will tend the vine?"
Dazed, Noah saw his wife through bleary eyes
"Such a strange dream..." he mumbled.

DINAH DISPARUE

J'ai sorti d'un tiroir une vieille photo
D'une toute petite fille avec un grand manteau.
D'énormes yeux noirs étonnés,
Un sourire un peu triste,
Dans sa main une fleur fanée,
Et tirant un chien qui résiste.
Sur sa poitrine, du côté coeur
L'Étoile Jaune est solidement cousue...
Où es-tu à présent ma petite soeur,
Dans la tourmente qu'es-tu devenue?
J'ai remis au tiroir la vieille photo jaunie
Papier sans valeur qui pour moi est sans prix.
Une enfance effacée, une jeunesse éteinte.
Un affreux livre noir refermé.
Une symphonie faite de plaintes.
Le souvenir d'une époque heureusement révolue,
Que j'aurai préféré ne pas avoir vécue...

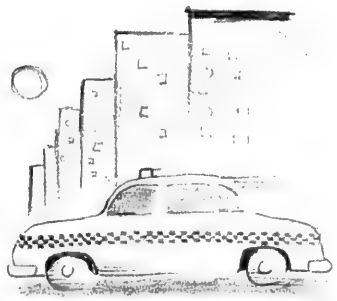
From Soviet rockets to Brooklyn cabs

By SORIN FINCHELSTEIN



Hi! My name is Boris Nathanson. Years ago, and miles away, I used to be Boris Nachumovitch Namestnikov, Soviet rocket scientist and Lenin Order laureate. Then, my brother's quaint decision to give away his hammered-and-sickled citizenship and settle outside the Iron Curtain prompted my overnight transfer from the Ballistic Research Institute in the (secret) outskirts of Moscow to a less illustrious farming machinery plant, back in my small Ukrainian hometown. (As one of my bosses at the institute put it, "Comrade Namestnikov, you must understand that scientific skills, however remarkable, cannot, and should not make up for political liability!")

As the new head of the wheelbarrow division (an interesting evolution, considering that I come from a long line of pedlars), I felt entitled to revert to my old Nathanson identity. Soon after that, I formally applied to join my, by-then-American, brother. Yet, since I was the potentially dangerous beholder of sensitive state secrets (concerning strategic fields such as rocket-craft and barrow-craft), it took another 15 years for me to eventually land in Manhattan — the very target of the rockets I had once designed.

Since my arrival here, I have developed an intimate knowledge of yet another means of transportation. Six hundred unanswered job applications convinced me that I'm out of sync with the latest — rocket-wise and barrow-wise — developments in my field of expertise.

Hence, I eventually accepted the only employment my country of adoption (actually, a cousin, twice removed on my mother's side) offered: driving a cab all over the Big Apple. This job gives me the opportunity to meet plenty of Jewish fellows, who, willing to confirm the stereotype, really love to talk.

Take my average client, for instance! He first embarks on a journey into your background. "Don't tell me where you come from! Let me guess; you must come from Poland... You came from Ukraine? Why, this doesn't make much of a difference! For who really knows where Poland ends and Ukraine begins? This riddle they haven't been able to solve for some centuries now. After all, this was one of the reasons we ended up here. My brother-in-law's half-sister just emigrated from Ukraine. Back there, you might have come across her: Inna Motzkin! She used to teach philosophy in a college. Now, she lectures on her poor husband only, so he seems to be well on his way to becoming a philosopher. Over there, things don't seem to be so rosy, do they? Did you live anywhere near Chernobyl? You didn't? Anyway, what do you think, are they eventually gonna shut it down? By the way, did you hear the one about the Lodzer Rabbi visiting Chernobyl...?"

The atmosphere having been set, they then move into your business area. "Wow, you are a taxi driver! This is quite a parnosseh, nowadays! I know it firsthand, cause my wife's third cousin — another Ukrainian-born Jew — works as a taxi driver, too. Just three years ago he was still employed as a brain surgeon and complained about making less and less money. And how could he have made more money, since, honestly speaking, our Americans had no more brains? Watching TV 12 hours a day while eating junk food by the mouthful and smoking you-know-what certainly causes one's brain to shrink. And what would a shrunken brain require surgery for, anyway?

"I kept on reminding him of these things and eventually had the paskudnik quit brain surgery. At that time, he didn't even have a driver's licence and used to whine a lot about spending a fortune on cabs. So I suggested that taxi driving might be worth trying, for a change. And he indeed took a driving course, passed the test; got his licence, and there we are! Ay, ay, ay, if you could only see him today, this third cousin of my wife! While he worked as a brain surgeon he didn't have a car of his own and he rented a shabby one-bedroom basement in Lower Mahnahttan. As of today, he owns a mansion in Queens, a luxury condominium in Florida, an antique Bentley for him and a brand new, Italian convertible to help his wife on her weekly shopping spree.

"Of course, he has done some investments too: mutual funds, Israel Bonds and the likes. Not bad for three years! Don't you think so? And please consider that he only works part time! Do you fancy him as ever being nostalgic about opening a skull? Then again, the shmuck has totally forgotten we were once family, however extended. Anyway, how's business been, lately?"

Or my passenger might try a different approach: "You are a brain surgeon? Wow! This is quite a parnosseh, nowadays! I know it firsthand, cause my wife's third cousin — another Ukrainian-born Jew — works as a brain surgeon too. Just three years ago he was still toiling as a taxi driver and complaining about making less and less money. And how could he have made more money since our Americans had obviously ceased wandering around? For watching TV 12 hours a day while eating junk food by the mouthful and smoking you-know-what leaves one with little inclination for jaunting.

"I kept on reminding him of these things and eventually had him quit taxi driving. At that time, he had just come off some minor brain surgery and whined a lot about having spent a fortune on it. So I suggested that it might be worth trying to become a brain surgeon for a change. And indeed, he took some night courses at a community college, passed the exams, got his licence, and there we are! Ay, ay, ay, if you could only see him today, this third cousin of my wife! While he worked as a taxi driver he didn't even have a car of his own and he rented a shabby one-bedroom basement in Lower Manhattan. As of today, he owns a mansion in Queens, a luxury condominium in Florida, an antique Bentley for him and a brand new, Italian convertible to help his wife on her weekly shopping spree.

"Of course, he has done some investments too: mutual funds, Israel Bonds, and the like. Not bad for three years! Don't you think so? And, please, consider that he operates only now and then! Do you fancy him as ever being nostalgic about laboring the wheel of a cab? Then again, the momzer has totally forgotten we were once family. however extended. Anyway, how's business been, lately?"

No matter which way one makes a living, the guy would always have a third cousin, or a fourth cousin, or his wife would have a distant relative involved — and quite recently — in the same trade one is associated with. ("Wow, you're a spy...my father-in-law's stepbrother is also a spy...used to be a butcher in a slaughterhouse...business went down: animal rights, red meat, cholesterol, shmolesterol...told him, 'Why not apply for CIA? I've just heard these big shots in Langley are in desperate need of people who can speak English with a heavy Jewish-Russian accent.'...if you could only see him today, this stepbrother of my father-in-law...considering that he spies part time only...")

Nevertheless, it is pleasantly reassuring to know that people who have just recently switched to your line of work enjoy such an amazing success. Hence, the only thing you need is a bit of patience. For the mansion and the Bentley and the castle in Spain and the princess' hand and the Nobel Prize for surgeons or butchers or cab drivers or — for that matter — spies, they are all anxiously waiting for you, just around the corner of 42nd and 7th.

Now, since the two of you got really acquainted, you deserve — in turn — to learn some things about this fellow. "We, too, came from Poland, some 40 years ago. Back there, my folks were so needy we could afford chicken soup but once a leap year. As the old saying goes, 'When a poor Jew eats chicken, one of them is sick.' Eventually, we played a nasty trick on Hitler, for we made it across the ocean one week before he himself made it into Poland. Considering chicken soup alone, it was definitely better; yet, we then worked so hard that — at the end of the day — even having chicken soup brought us little enjoyment."

Despite the fact that there are still a handful of matters to be, if not settled, at least, addressed, the trip is bound to end. "What a pity I have to get off, now! Never mind, I really enjoyed talking to you! Have my business card, please, just in case you might one day — and I hope this day will come soon — be in need of some financial planning! For this is my line of work. Luftshmeck, Schmeckshmalz, & Shmalzluft. I'm the first one: Melvin Luftshmeck! The other two partners are my sons-in-law. Some partners they are! There is no need to tell me your name for when one has got past 60, names barely stick to one's memory. If you ever call me — and I really look forward to it — just say you are the Yid from Chernobyl. Gut Shabbes, anyway!"

The Litvak

By CHAIM KORNBERG

It was after I quit university. Or maybe during the desperate months before that. Several days each week I would make my way down to Kensington Market, and spend most of the day at Jack Friedman's furniture store. My friend Larry, whose father owned the business, would often be there, and there were also two or three other regulars. It was the perfect place for us.

Between the sidewalk and the store, there was an area that could hold about three couches and two tables with chairs. Shipments were delivered and dropped off into this space, deals were made, and most important for us, it served as an outdoor lounge. On pleasant days, we would sit on the couches and chat or just watch the passing parade. In worse weather, we sat inside at the tables and talked about more serious things, or stare outside into the darkness. People came and went — to buy, to get advice, to hear news or just to pass the time.

One of the regulars was a rather tall man with a distinguished mustache, who always wore a hat. He spoke slowly, with a deep and resonant voice. At that time, Jewish Toronto was almost all from Poland; so being one of a kind, he came to be called the Litvak. Only years later did I find out his real name.

If life had been different, he might have become a judge or a professor. Indeed, at times, he filled those functions for us. But life being what it was, he also spent a large part of his day sitting around the furniture store. In the evenings, I would often see him strolling along College Street with a friend, each with his hands clasped behind his back. The pace of their walk was slow, but the conversation seemed intense.

He and his late wife had both survived Auschwitz and, according to him, felt quite triumphant about it. That is, as triumphant as you could feel in the middle of death. They saw their life together as something of a miracle. Only a distant cousin, his one relative in the world, was left alive.

A while after the war ended, when they were in Austria, the Litvak's wife got appendicitis. The doctors operated on her, but according to the Litvak, they left something inside. A few days later, he saw a dark ring on her skin around the incision. He told the doctors, but they just laughed it off. Even after the fever rose, no one did anything. She died that week.

He kept asking me to help him write letters. He had to protest. He had to tell the world about this outrageous injustice. I tried to convince him to think more rationally. Who would he be accusing? Doctors? Germans? He wasn't sure. Maybe both. Maybe neither. And who would we write to? The medical association? The newspapers?

Maybe I should have acted differently. Maybe I should have kept him busy for the next few years writing and waiting for answers. He might have gotten a sympathetic letter or two, or a response in a newspaper. It would have, at least, kept his mind off the Big Pain. Why not comfort him with a long project to work off all that energy?

But, I think I respected him too much to do that. He wasn't a man I wanted to see lost in a dream. Or, it could be that I didn't understand the depth of his pain, or that I was just too caught up in myself.

At any rate, we never wrote any letters and the months passed. The Litvak would tell us about how he kept moving from one rooming house to another. One didn't have enough heat; another was too noisy; a third had something else wrong with it. We kept telling him to move north to where the Jews were. He would be more comfortable there and feel more like a part of a neighborhood and a part of the world. But he preferred to stay downtown. Up north, no one sat around furniture stores and no one strolled in the evenings.

One cold snowy night, the Litvak and I were sitting at a table, looking silently out the front window. Each of us was lost in our own dream. There hadn't been a customer for hours. He startled me when he started speaking. The Litvak's face was turned to me and his eyes looked even more intense than usual.

"I remember in cheder," he said, "they told me that G-d made the world in six days. But I have a question! I have a question!"

His eyes looked fiery now, as he pointed his index finger into my face. He was almost screaming, "What was a day?! What was a day before?!"

He was asking me what existed before the creation of the universe. I stared back into his blazing eyes. What was nothingness like? No space. No time. No up, no down. No past, no future. Nothing. What is the Creator before Creation? This is what he spent part of every sleepless night and each day thinking about. The day before. Maybe somewhere in that endless nothingness, outrageous injustices didn't contradict what you were taught in cheder. Maybe for him, the only possible harmony left was in a world absolutely beyond anything that could be imagined. Or maybe the only possible reaction to the pain beyond all pains was the silence beyond all silences.

He didn't really expect an answer from me. His finger was still in my face, but it was really pointing far beyond me.

A few years passed, and my life took more of a direction. I rarely went to Mr. Friedman's furniture store and I was usually busy with one thing or another. One day, while walking along north Bathurst Street, I saw the Litvak drinking a cup of coffee at the counter of a restaurant. I walked in, greeted him, and of course, we were both very happy to see each other. He was renting a normal apartment in a highrise in the middle of the Jewish neighborhood, and seemed happy with the change. He asked about me and was glad to hear that I was more-or-less spending my time productively. Then he smiled, and spoke more quietly.

"I'm going to Eretz Yisrael," he said.

"Are you going to visit?" I asked.

"No, I'm going to live there," he answered.

It seemed like a radical move for someone who had never been there. "Shouldn't you visit first?" I countered. "Maybe you won't like it."

He smiled a smile of total contentment. "Oh, I'll like it," he said. "I know I'll like it."

We chatted for a while, said goodbye and wished each other well. I left him sitting, relaxed, in front of another cup of coffee. That was the last time I saw him.

A few months later, a friend discovered him in his apartment. He was, of course, buried in Eretz Yisrael.

Thank you, Chaya

By MITZI COHEN

Thank you, Chaya. With your arrival, I now have a new title, that of Bubbie. Now I fully understand the bumper-stickers that scream, "Ask me about my grandchildren." I don't like to brag about my children, but I have no compunction about raving about the wonders of my granddaughter. I delight in her beauty, in her alertness and in her cute antics.

My mother felt too young to be called Bubbie, so she asked my kids to call her Rosalie, her first name. Shalom Aleichem also felt too young to be called Zayde by his grandchildren. He asked them to call him Papa. Both the famous humorist and my mother met an early demise–Aleichem at the age of 57, my mother at 66. Perhaps my delight in being called Bubbie will be a sgulah for longevity.

My Brethren

My heart is open in love for you, my brethren of Poland, Morocco, the Ukraine, by the shores of the Hudson and Dnieper.

Mercurial are you, restless, deep as the night is your sorrow,
glowing like sunshine is your joy.
I would recognize in the dark
by the glimmer of your eyes,
by your hurried gait.
I follow you like a shadow in all the metropolises of the world.

In new lands, overseas,
you regained your vigor,
your sons grew tall and the daughters blossomed like slender flowers.

No doubt they'll carry our heritage in the adopted lands and there where eastern skies pour flame into the veins of our everlasting stem.

The Afikomen

By DONIA B. CLENMAN

Seder was not usually a cheerful affair in the Fenigstein house. Dutiful, yes, but decidedly not cheerful. They were an odd assembly of agnostics, atheists, cynical idealists, Holocaust survivors, passionate Jews, ambivalent Jews and Jewish non-Jews. And Passover was a crumbly mortar. It just held, but not freely or joyfully. They were in bondage, each in a different prison, with Moses sound asleep on Mount Nebo.

But this year it was different. And it showed in the seemingly trifling things that matter. First the preparations. In other years there were none. The date just materialized and that was that. This time it was circled on the calendar and set aside like a festive carp. The fridge and the oven began humming noisy duets. Smells pervaded the house. Then a sound of a song was heard, a Haggadah opened, another voice joined, a piano arrangement was added, and lo and behold, a rehearsal was in swing, the voices flowing more easily, higher, faster.

At the last moment a gentile girl had been added to the party. She had been brought by the son. "Lydia would like to see a seder," he had said, and the unexpected confrontation yielded a grudging "yes" from the bewildered mother.

She was a pale girl, about 20, with round owl glasses that she constantly adjusted. They didn't know why she had wanted to come, for she looked angry and bored throughout the evening. She ate little. Wine did not relax her. She rarely spoke. At times she looked strangely old. She made them nervous. Why had she come? Was she a victim of divine objectivity or was she driven by a loneliness which made even this odd assembly preferable?

Anyway, the Fenigsteins were happy that night. Parents, children and grandchildren prayed, sang and rejoiced. Words had meaning. They rolled off their tongues like honey, voices blended like myrrh and frankincense. The atheist, the agnostic, the idealist, the survivor, all praised God the Free. Wine flowed like the Jordan. Elijah had wings and appetite. Exile was ended. "Blessed be Thou O Lord who has kept us alive, preserved us and brought us to this day" — they chanted.

They were startled when Lydia suddenly spoke up. It is the Passover custom for the father to hide the afikoman, the middle portion of the matzah which is also the dessert of the meal, and for the children to look for it. On finding it, they may claim a reward for its return. Since in the wholeness of the seder no detail can be omitted, the process can be hard and prolonged. Lydia instantly joined in the tumult. With childish enthusiasm she ran with the Fenigstein children, then joined in the noisy bargaining. She wanted a rose, "a baby rose" — she said, her voice high pitched like a bird's, her cheeks smooth and rosy; young, pretty, transformed.

Shortly after the seder, Mrs. Fenigstein intended to buy a rose, more than one, a pretty bouquet. But she delayed, procrastinated, for Egypt again intruded on her life. Three months later she finally bought a bunch, only to find, on unwrapping, that the heads were stapled to the stems, and the poor things died on the table in a shower of faded, shrivelled petals.

It was closer to Chanukah than Passover when she again remembered and, a trifle embarrassed but happy, knocked at the girl's lodging. She waited a long time before realizing that the bell had long passed into oblivion, then rapped hard. Suddenly, she was confronted by a dirty housecoat and a head full of paper and metal.

"You lookin' for someone," barked the landlady not trying to hide her displeasure.

"Is Lydia in?"

"You a relative or somethin'?" she opened the door a crack wider, her eyes on the roses.

"No, just a visitor. May I see her?"

"She doesn't live here any more."

"Oh, when did she move out?"

"Well, she was a strange one. Didn't talk to no one. You're the first to call here. One mornin' we couldn't wake her up so we called an ambulance and they just wheeled her off to the hospital. That's all I can tell you. She was queer alright."

Mrs. Fenigstein's lips trembled. The afikoman. Lydia's prize so fairly won and never collected. "O My Lord who has kept us, sustained us and brought us to this day, what shall I do with Lydia's afikoman?"

Who's there? A Yid

By ALVIN ABRAM

The dirty water drips on his head distracting his muttering. Lying on his stomach, Yitzhak stretches his arms forward and digs the hoe into the earth, freeing another block of mud and water. "Stupid," he grumbles under his breath as a blob of mud drops on his head. He pushes the earth behind him, knowing Abramowicz will push it to someone further back who will fill the sacks to be taken outside when it becomes dark.

"Abramowicz," he whispers behind him. "I need another wall."

"Shhh. The Germans have ears. No noise. Water carries sound."

"No noise? You said it wasn't going to rain. What do you call what I'm lying in? Flowers?"

"Please Gott. Shah! Mr. Krajowa told me it was cloudy. No rain. Did you want I should go outside to confirm?"

"Another wall before I am buried in mud. The walls have more water in them, than my bladder."

Chaim Abramowicz pushes a wooden wall section he had constructed earlier past his lying body toward Yitzhak.

Yitzhak pounds the section against the mud wall. Under his breath, he continues to mumble. "Since when don't clouds mean rain?" He turns his attention to the tunnel wall, hacking at it. Water slips into his trousers and he can feel it dribble down to his thighs.

"How are you doing?" Abramowicz asked.

"How am I doing? Just marvellous. A lifetime in school and what am I doing? I dig a hole to hide from the Germans. A diploma on my wall, a certificate of recognition from the Polish government in my briefcase and now I am an expert in hole digging. I'm doing fine."

"I thought you were a lawyer?"

"Not just a lawyer. A prosecuting lawyer. Do you realize what I'm doing is not legal. I don't have a work permit."

"So, sue the Germans."

"Shmuck! What will I gain. A bullet in the head."

"Yes! So keep digging. This way, you gain your life."

"Gott in heaven. I know you are not a weatherman. That's obvious. Are you a rabbi?"

"No. I'm a plumber."

"Of course. I should have guessed. No wonder this water doesn't bother you. You're used to it."

"Are you used to criminals?"

"Now you want a debate. Another section Mr. Plumber. I don't like the way the wall keeps weeping. It cries more than I do."

Abramowicz pushes another section forward and Yitzhak pounds it into the wall. He turns to look at Abramowicz. "How is it behind you?"

Abramowicz turns and asks someone a question. He turns back to Yitzhak. "They're doing fine. The room is another foot bigger."

Yitzhak nods, but does not return to his digging.

Abramowicz asks, "Are you all right? Do you want to change places?"

"Who's alive upstairs? Anyone?"

"Who do you want to be alive?"

"My brother. He's all that's left of my family. They're all gone. Do you know how I became a lawyer? My brother. He worked. I went to school. I studied. He slaved. I graduated and earned a lot of money. I said to him. Take. What I have is yours. Do you know what he said? I already took. Took, what?

Wishing is not the truth

I asked. Nachas. Pride. My brother is a lawyer. You have repaid me. But I didn't. I was too busy to share myself. I live and he's dead."

"He could be alive."

"Stop lying! They're all dead! You can't even tell if it is going to rain, how can you know he is alive." Yitzhak turned back toward the wall of earth and began hacking into it.

The hours passed and the tunnel inched further and further into the unknown. Beneath an obscure house, 16 Jews are hiding. Mr. Krajowa, a gentile who disapproves of Hitler, was building a bunker, so more Jews could be hidden. Overhead, German soldiers patrol with dogs, looking for runaway Jews. For more than two weeks, Mr. Krajowa has undertaken a task he might have reconsidered had he realized what he was starting. It began with only two Jews hidden in his basement. One night there was a discreet knock on his door and a man, woman and two children were crouched in the dark.

"Help us," the man begged. "We heard you have Jews hidden here."

Mr. Krajowa opened the door and ushered them inside. By the end of the week, he had 10 Jews. The basement could not hold them. It was decided to build a bunker to the west of the house under an open field between Mr. Krajowa's house and his neighbor's. Every day, Mr. Krajowa removed some of the excess earth and dumped it in the field.

With the money the Jews gave him, he would go to five or six different stores to buy food so as not to cause suspicion as to the quantity he was purchasing. Six more Jews had appeared and everyone feared there were too many, but no one wanted to leave.

Yitzhak asked for a break and everyone backed out to let him pass. Abramowicz joined him. "He could be alive?"

"He could have wings?"

"I wasn't lying."

The tunnel inched further into the unknown

[Cont'd from page B21]

"You weren't telling the truth. Wishing is not the truth."

"Were you always a cynic?"

"Were you always naive?"

"The Torah said, 'As long as man breathes he should not lose hope.'"

"Common sense says, if two men say you are drunk even if you claim not to have taken a drink, then you are drunk."

"That's not common sense. That's nonsense. If this is the way you think, your brother wasted his time on you. If you are alive, he's alive. He lives in your memories."

"You sure you're a plumber? You sound like a rabbi."

"You sure you're a lawyer? You sound like a mortician."

They look at each other and they laugh.

Yitzhak stands and looks toward the hole. "It's time to dig."

Abramowicz nods.

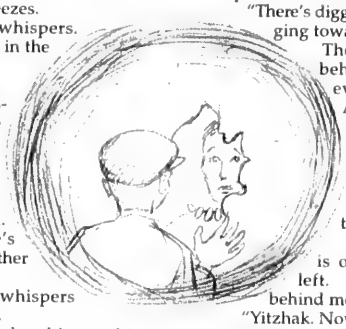
They squeeze their way into the tunnel and resume their positions.

Yitzhak turns to Abramowicz. "Thanks."

"You're welcome."

For the next hour, there is no further conversation. The grunting and straining are the only sounds that can be heard. Yitzhak thrusts his hoe into the wall and hears a new sound from the other side. He freezes.

"Shhh," he whispers. "There's a sound in the wall."



Abramowicz whispers the message back to the others.

Yitzhak scrapes at the wall carefully. He listens again. "Shhh. There's someone on the other side."

Abramowicz whispers the message back.

Yitzhak digs below him, making a hole in which to stand. He scoops the earth and pushes it back to Abramowicz.

"What do you hear?" Abramowicz asked.

"Voices."

"Germans?"

"I don't know?"

The hole is now large enough for Yitzhak to stand. He scrapes again at the wall, places his ear against it and listens.

"There's digging. Someone's digging toward us."

There is a scurrying behind Yitzhak as everyone except Abramowicz withdraws from the tunnel.

"Come out," Abramowicz whispers. "It could be the Germans."

"To where? There is only one direction left. I know what is behind me. Ahead is hope."

"Yitzhak. Now is not the time to prove me wrong."

Yitzhak laughs. "You're right. Now is the time to prove you right."

Yitzhak strikes a blow against the wall, letting the pieces fall to his feet. A section of the wall collapses. As he looks at the opening, another piece falls off from a blow from the other side.

Abramowicz whispers, "Oy vey."

Another piece falls out and the end of a shovel pushes toward Yitzhak.

"Who's there?" a voice asks in Yiddish.

"A Yid," Yitzhak replies.

There is silence.

"I don't believe it."

"Why?"

"Cause the last time I saw you, you were too busy making money.

"What?"

Another chunk falls away and the upper part of the wall collapses. "Nu. Say something. Is this the way you greet an older brother?"

Yitzhak stares into his brother's dirty face. "I don't believe it."

"Okay. Seal up the wall."

Yitzhak laughs with tears running down his cheeks. "What are you doing here?"

His brother smiles. "We've been digging for a week. We were going to make a bunker underneath the field.

been lost for more than five years. God only knew how long he'd be living in the woods with Goldman.

"C'mon Plotnik, there are others. We can get a meal."

"There are others? What do you mean there are others?"

"Shmendrik! This is a big forest in case you didn't know. Lots of people get lost here."

And Goldman was right. After walking for a short time Mr. Plotnik found himself in a small encampment with a roaring fire and people all over the place. "Everybody, we have a new member in our little group. Now some of you may know him, some of you may not." Goldman turned and whispered to Mr, Plotnik that not everyone was from their village. "This here is Mr. Plotnik."

Mr. Plotnik bowed his head slightly. "Hey Plotnik!" "Well, look who it is." "Mr. Plotnik good to see you, though not under these circumstances of course." Mr. Plotnik could hardly believe his eyes. There was Mrs. Cohen and Mrs. Steinbok and Mr. Geld, and even the Goodman twins, still with all their lipstick.

"But you're all, I thought you had..." Mr. Plotnik backed away from the approaching acquaintances.

"No, no." They said in unison. "We've been lost."

"But I, I know, I saw your bodies," he said pointing at the Goodman twins. "You had fallen into the river and..."

The girls' laughter disarmed him and he when he remembered as best he could the incident he had to admit that he had only seen them being fished out of the water from a distance and that he had not stayed around to actually see their bodies because the sight would have been too awful. Maybe they had run away and really had gotten lost. God only knows how many times they had run away before and to God only knows where, and maybe their mother was so embarrassed by their taking off she had just made up that they were...

The girls' laughter disarmed him

"Anyway Plotnik," said Goldman gruffly, "now that maybe you've stopped acting like an idiot you can sit down and have something to eat. How about a little soup?"

The idea was very appealing to Mr. Plotnik because after all he hadn't had a thing in his stomach for hours, since noon now that he thought of it, so he nodded his head in agreement with Goldman's suggestion and sat down. He was passed a large bowl of soup by Mrs. Cohen who leaned over in Mr. Plotnik's direction, her breath as garlicky as ever, to tell him how wonderful it was to see him, and without his wife who in her estimation was never good enough for him, when seemingly out of nowhere a strong loud voice commanded Mr. Plotnik to put the bowl down.

"You don't belong here!"

It was Mr. Plotnik's old doctor, Dr. Rosen, who he could have sworn had died from diphtheria.

"Oh sure he does, Dr. Rosen," offered Goldman timidly. "I found him wandering lost in the forest like the rest of us."

Dr. Rosen appeared before Mr. Plotnik, put his hand on his shoulders and pulled him up "Come with me." He quickly led Mr. Plotnik by the arm through the forest. Mr. Plotnik stumbled several times and called for Dr. Rosen to stop or at the very least to rest for a moment but the doctor was oblivious to his pleas and continued his hurried pace and before Mr. Plotnik could properly focus on exactly where he was he was standing in the middle of his house and the doctor had vanished.

Mr. Plotnik looked confusedly around the room, his eyes resting finally on his wife.

"I'm home."

"So big deal."

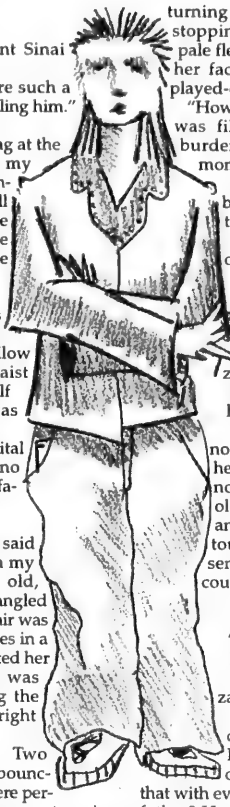
My beloved Zaydie

By JANICE GREENE



"He's in ICU at Mount Sinai Hospital and it's all your fault. You're such a disappointment to him, you're killing him."

The receiver went dead.

A lone pigeon was busy picking at the grey crust of snow outside my window sill. Something was pushing on my sternum...pushing it till it would break in two — since there was no heart to break — she often told me — she often told me — my sternum would do.

* * *

The hospital waiting room was empty except for my mother. White walls with a beige and yellow stripe all around the room — waist height — cutting the world in half — all around the room. She was sitting looking small.

"How can you come to a hospital dressed like that? Have you no shame? You can't see your grandfather, not like that!"

She had spoken.

Before anything else could be said about my appearance, a woman my mother's age, around 65 years old, walked in. Three gold bracelets jangled her proclamation of arrival. Her hair was copper red, cut to fall over her eyes in a peek-a-boo-look whenever she tilted her head slightly to the right. She was fleshier than my mother, filling the room with sweet perfume and bright greens and blues.

I watched them together. Two strangers lit by filtered sunlight bouncing off old snow. The windows were perspiring. The woman was holding a steaming coffee in a styrofoam cup. Her left hand was busy turning the large diamond ring on her third finger, turning and twisting, twisting and turning; stopping; then digging, digging it into her pale flesh over and over. She had a smile on her face directed at my mother; a quiet, played-out smile.

"How's your husband?" My mother's voice was filled with concern over another's burden. I was not in existence at that moment.

"He's still in very serious condition, but they say he's at least stable for the time being. Thank-you for asking."

Her voice was a surprise. It was that of a 6-year-old, light, airy, take-care-of-me kind of voice. It annoyed me with it's prepubescent sweetness. She tilted her head slightly to the right, hair falling just so, smiled her smile, then went to check out the magazine pile on one of the chairs.

My mother sat alone. I watched her flip through the pages of last month's Chatelaine, confident that no one knew: She saw nothing without her reading glasses. Her white hair had none of that butterscotch tint so many older women have. It was cut for wash and dry, quick and easy. I watched her touch the hanging skin of her neck absentmindedly as I wondered how she could make herself look so small when it served her.

* * *

"Just tell me where he is."

My voice had returned from the shadows. I wanted to see my zayde.

"You're not going in to see Pa dressed like that. Look at that jacket! It's a shmatte! You want to shame your own grandfather? Forget me — you do that with every breath you take...but your grandfather? Have you no respect at all?" Her voice hissed through perfect teeth.

My beloved Zaydie

My jacket was my pride and joy. It was ruddy brown lamb. The sleeves were attached, so that if I unsnapped the snaps, they would become like wings — mini capes my arms would hang from. I had spent many hours in my favorite second-hand clothes store searching for just the right coat.

There was always something I could find in Second Hand Rose. Barrels upon barrels of silk and polyester kerchiefs cluttered the floor. Dresses and shirts lined the flowered walls, hung on misshapen wire hangers. The clothes were from the '40s and '50s. I wore them well. It was 1972 and Twiggy reigned as the image of perfect womanhood. An icon I could never emulate.

He was on one of those trolleys on wheels. My zayde. My wonderful, big nosed, spitting zayde. He never claimed shame and my name in the same breathe. He never claimed to understand either. He would shake his proud pink head, white strands of hair across his soft scalp. Shake and laugh and point at me with his arthritic claws.

'It's Shaindel Malkah'

He would say, "Mishigah tzitoit, but it's OK, it's Shaindel Malkah."

That was me, Shaindel, the daughter of his favorite son and beloved daughter-in-law. The one who begged for his stories like a mongrel begging for scraps of food from this little 5 foot 6 inch man.

He was tough, lean, strong, with blue eyes so washed out I wondered how he could see through them. I could never get enough of his stories. Like when he marched in Poland leading a rally against conscription of Jews. Or when he was put in jail, and his Sophie, the grandmother I never met, would come and visit him against her family's orders. She, from an old learned family of rebbes living in a small shtetl; him, my zayde, a poor self-taught tailor.

I was the one who would ask again and again about the pictures hanging on his mustard walls, his diverse collection of books all in Yiddish, and the one he would hand challah to under the table during Friday night dinner, and laugh when my mother would say: "Pa, she's a girl, she'll get fat." He'd laugh as spit would fall from his teeth.

He was lying on his back, mouth open, lipless, toothless, white strands of hair all on the wrong side of his head — all on the wrong side.

Tubes up his nose, tubes stuck ferociously into his arms, tubes hanging. Bags all around filled with different colors: red, orange, clear. And then the low hanging bag — the yellow one — the indignity one.

His eyes were closed. I knew his scent. I would always know his body scent, the one that loved me.

I couldn't go up to him. Maybe she was right. Maybe I was being disrespectful by being me. Maybe I was responsible for killing this one person I knew loved me. Never the words but always a cluck and a smile.

'His voice got stronger'

I stood looking at him from the distance.

"Shaindel?" I heard a weak voice. I heard zayde's voice.

"Shaindel? Voos machst du?"

"Zayde." My voice trembled with so much love I didn't know it could speak. "Zayde...ya it's me."

His head tried to turn. The weight of the tubes made it difficult. But those eyes — those washed out blue eyes that looked straight through you — they were seeing me.

"Kimme here Shaindel" His voice got stronger, more demanding. "Kimme here"

His fingers reached out and called for me. I walked slowly towards this old man hoping, praying, that when he saw me, he wouldn't die immediately through my so-called powers of shaming and killing people.

"Kimme here"

He pulled as strongly as he could grabbing onto my jacket — that jacket. I saw his fingers touch and feel the material with years and years of experience.

This is it, I thought.

And then he said in a low gurgle,

"Shaindel, nice material. Where did you get this, I like it."

Who's there?

[Cont'd from page B22]

The rain collapsed the end of the tunnel, so we changed directions this morning."

"I thought you were dead."

"There was a time I thought so too."

"I'm sorry for forgetting about you."

"I'm glad you remembered."

"A real friend feels no need to excuse himself for some failing," came a voice from behind Yitzhak.

"Who's that?"

"Chaim Abramowicz. He gave up a job as a weatherman to become a plumber, but he thinks he's a rabbi who has blessed us."

"From his mouth to God's ears," Yitzhak's brother said as he reached over the broken wall and grabbed his brother in his arms.

"Amen," said Abramowicz.

The battlefield casualty

By HASKELL NUSSBAUM

"He leads me on paths of Justice."
Psalms 23

The soldiers prepared their ambush site silently. They moved automatically, familiar in their role as Israel's guardians of the Lebanese border. As second in command, Gideon Horowitz scoured the terrain for hidden bombs and motioned his approval to Beni, the officer in charge. Beni nodded and made a downward jab of his hand. As one, the soldiers dropped into position.

Gideon thought about the men around him carefully. They were all Reserve soldiers like himself, and, with one exception, all hoped that the night would pass uneventfully. Gideon was the exception. Gideon hoped that tonight the terrorists would try to get through. Ever since Sarah's brutal murder, Gideon had been filled with an unending rage.

The waiting was torture. It was hard not to think of Sarah. The nightmare of finding her body, of counting the wounds and seeing the finality of the lifelessness in her eyes. He continued to blame himself. If he had only been there that night, he knew things would have been different. He would have stopped the bastard with the knife. He would have killed the terrorist himself, saving his wife. He would have — the rational part of his mind intruded. She had been killed in her sleep and had he been there, he would have been killed as well. I wish I had been, Gideon thought bitterly. He could still see her smile, and he ached with the memory.

Suddenly machine gun fire erupted to his right. Deafening noise shook Gideon out of his reverie.

"Infiltrators at two o'clock!"

All at once the night was ablaze with orange and red as tracer bullets lit up the sky lighting the way to their targets.

"Moshe, fire a grenade!" Gideon shouted, as he pumped away bullets from his submachine gun. He could make out forms in the distance and directed short bursts of automatic fire in that direction. Suddenly he heard a scream from nearby and in a quick glance saw that Beni had been hit. He couldn't determine whether Beni was wounded or dead, but it suddenly didn't matter, as he realized that he was in charge now. He barked orders at the other soldiers and, at the appropriate time, Gideon shouted "Storm!" and the ambush team quickly rose and ran shooting at the terrorists now hopefully dead from all the previous fire.

"Hold fire!" Gideon shouted. He counted four dead terrorists and one wounded. Beni was dead.

All of a sudden, Gideon saw Avner, a small wiry man, aim his submachine gun at the wounded terrorist and Dror, the machine gunner, screamed, "Stop!"

Avner paused, startled. "What's the matter? What happened?"

Dror stepped up to Avner and pushed Avner's gun down. "He's helpless. He's not a threat any more."

"He's a terrorist," Avner countered, clearly confused. "He deserves death. What's wrong with you?"

"He's wounded, he's on the ground, he's not a threat any more," Dror repeated stubbornly, "It's not necessary to kill him and it's wrong. If you were wounded in their hands do you think it would be right for them to kill you?"

"Do you think they wouldn't? Do you think that this —" Avner pointed to the man bleeding and screaming on the ground "thing that you think is human wouldn't cut you down like a dog? Look at them! Look at how they're armed!"

Avner bent down and went through the man's pockets, ignoring the screams emanating from him. "Look at this map! Do you think that they were coming to give us candy?"

Avner turned to Gideon "Look, Giddy, your town — Kiryat Shmonah — is marked in red too. Your town. Let me finish him off. Let me give the bastard what he deserves."

Gideon stood and stared at the map. He could almost see his house circled with a bulls-eye. There was no doubt what the terrorists' intentions had been. Vengeance, his mind cried.

"It's wrong. Giddy," Dror was entreating him. "It makes us like them — hitting on the helpless. Let him come before a court, let him be tried, but don't kill him. That's murder."

The battlefield casualty

Gideon stared at Dror. Murder? He wanted to ask. He couldn't seem to open his mouth. His mind didn't know how to direct his mouth to speak. Sarah was dead and terrorists like this wounded man had committed the crime. Had Sarah been alive, her life would have been endangered by this man. All at once the terrorist before him seemed to be the symbol of all terrorists, indeed of all the evil in the world. Smite this man, his mind was inducing him, and you'll be ridding the world of a vicious evil.

"Try him?" Avner scorned. "Give him hospital care, too, I suppose? Feed him, clothe him, allow him to live when Beni is dead? Look at Beni, Giddy! Think of his family. Why in hell should this terrorist's family be better off than Beni's? And for what — so that he should be released in the next prisoner exchange — hundreds of them for one of us? No way, I say, no bloody way."

Avner sidestepped Dror and aimed the gun again. By this time, the terrorist on the ground could see what was going on and was crying something unintelligible Gideon saw the pain and naked fear in the man's eyes, yet was unmoved.

From the deep recesses of his mind, he heard a teacher's voice proclaiming the immorality of killing prisoners of war; he felt the conviction of his own beliefs that killing the helpless was wrong. And he knew the law. Yet he could not move. Oh, Sarah, he pleaded, tell me what course is right? Which is the moral course to take?

Dror addressed Avner desperately and scornfully "Who do you think you are? Prosecutor, judge, jury and executioner all rolled into one?"

Avner turned and stared defiantly into Dror's eyes,ignoring Gideon completely. "Do you doubt his guilt? Would you play advocate and plead his innocence? A trial is to determine guilt. But there is no question of his guilt. A judge is to pass an appropriate sentence. Is death not an appropriate sentence for a terrorist attempting murder of innocent civilians, women and children, not to mention Beni? As for executioner — ask not of others that which you lack courage to do yourself."

Gideon saw Dror start to protest and Avner turn away, Dror grabbed Gideon's arm.

"Giddy, stop him!" Dror demanded.

Gideon couldn't breathe. The man deserved death. Gideon wanted to kill him himself. Suddenly he heard his father's voice. When he spoke it was his father's words.

"Enough, Avner. Jews don't kill. We are not killers."

Avner stared at Gideon. "Jews don't kill?" He repeated scornfully. "For 2,000 years Jews didn't kill and we got the Holocaust. Well, this Jew kills."

With that, Avner turned toward the terrorist in one swift move. Gideon heard the burst of automatic fire, saw the terrorist's body jerk and knew that his command was no longer relevant. Avner had done the job. Dror looked sick.

Within moments, the helicopter carrying the base commanding officer approached and Gideon knew that when it landed, he should report Avner. He knew that strictly speaking he should turn himself in. As the commander in charge at the time, he could have stopped Avner and by all the military legal rules, he knew that what he had witnessed was murder. He knew that he himself was guilty, that his eyes had egged Avner on even as his voice commanded otherwise. But the thought hit him with terrible clarity that no one need know. He realized that Dror would not make a formal report on his own. He knew that the other soldiers did not for a moment consider the act of terminating a wounded terrorist murder at all, but simply justice. And that was the rub, Gideon thought ruefully, it had been justice. Hadn't it? What did Jews say about justice?

The helicopter landed. It was suddenly the moment of truth.

"Anything unusual to report, Giddy?"

Gideon stared back at the CO who had asked him, and immediately he knew what he had to do.

He felt himself draw a deep breath, readying his courage.

"No, Sir, just five terrorists getting exactly what they deserved."

Gideon turned away and walked off. Strangely, for the first time since Sarah's death he felt calm, almost serene. He did not blame Avner. He dismissed Dror's qualms and his father's. If justice is getting what's coming to you, then justice was served, he decided. Suddenly, he had an acute pang of doubt. He wondered if Sarah was smiling. He couldn't see her face. As he loaded his equipment onto the helicopter it occurred to him that only now did he know what it was like to be alone. Alone to walk down one path of justice. He decided that Sarah was smiling.

THE PHOTOGRAPH OF THE CHILDREN in the family photograph

i can match names to faces and that is all, out of the five children my Bubby and her brother Max survived the rest were never mentioned

my eyes would drift to the teenage sister the youngest with straight black hair and eyes that looked beyond you once i asked "Bubby what was she like"
"she had a good head, excellent Hebrew and always talked about Palestine"

how many times did my Bubby look at that photograph a young woman alone in a strange land it calmed her as she spoke to her little sister teased the eldest and touched the forehead of her brother when she worked the immigrant hours stitching days to nights

it was tucked inside her
— the hope that her family would cross the sea where the water thinned at the channel of her breasts and ran through her cotton dress

she sent one ticket to her brother who arrived in Montreal, the others:
sisters parents uncles aunts and cousins erased the family name one step at a time as they walked into the gas chambers

my eyes always find the youngest child in the lower left hand corner i see her separated from the others and finally parted from her long black hair as the razor rides over her head
i wonder about her last moments, her last gasp the mark her thin nails made as she scraped the walls
for a hand full of air

CJC ready with questions for federal candidates

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Candidates for the federal election coming as early as June should expect to face more Jewish community demands to deal with the war crimes issue, a recent Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region (CJC-Q) meeting was told.

That could come in the form of a much stronger emphasis placed on the issue as it already exists in CJC's federal Political Action Guide, a primer used to apprise candidates on CJC positions prior to elections.

The effort also falls in line with a new thrust within the Jewish community to rally the grassroots. The community has been increasingly frustrated by Ottawa's foot-dragging and is responding to the revelations of American private eye Steven Rambam.

Rambam made international news and embarrassed the Canadian government after easily discovering hundreds of alleged war criminals in Canada, dozens of whom freely admitted to him their involvement in atrocities and showing Canada to be one of the simplest places for war criminals to find safe haven.

On May 5, nationwide mass rallies are being planned to coincide with Yom Hashoah and a meeting between CJC officials and Justice Minister Allan Rock in Ottawa. In Montreal, the Jewish Community Foundation is providing special funding for a noon-time rally at Place du Canada.

CJC was upset by Rock's recent out-of-hand refusal to release figures and statistics on the government's war crimes investigations — numbers freely available in the United States at the American counterpart of Ottawa's War Crime Unit, the Office of Special Investigations.

Recent revelations have also come out to the effect that since the Deschenes Commission a decade ago, the Canadian government's investigation of possible war criminals living in Canada has been hampered by a chronic lack of will, internecine disputes over strategy, and even possible anti-Semitic bias.

Rabbi Reuben Poupko said that in Canada, the issue has truly "come to a head," with plans by CJC to reveal publicly the names of alleged war criminals on a regular basis and to continue its snitch line for informants.

One member of the executive, survivor Issie Veisfeld, took issue with the latter strategy, saying there should be "no deals, no deals made with Nazi collaborators."

But Rabbi Poupko said CJC is recommending "an offer of consideration, not immunity" for informants, a practice in other countries.

"We both agree that the main issue is putting pressure on government," he said.

Groups cooperate in Foundation 1 Project

MONTREAL — The City of Vienna's School Board, Montreal's Kleinmann Family Foundation and the Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre (MHMC) are cooperating in an educational program called Foundation Project 1/Global Outreach.

The aim of the program using the theme of Transforming Memory Into Knowledge is to encourage critical thinking and moral responsibility amongst youth.

The first event took place in Vienna last month and was hosted by Dr. Kurt Scholz, president of the City of Vienna's school board, and Magistra Franz Schimek, its international affairs representative.

The week-long conference was attended and sponsored by political representatives of Austria, Canada and Israel.

Israeli ambassador to Austria Yoel Sher's opening comments summarized the mandate of this pilot seminar: "Ethnic cleansing, hate literature, genocide, killing fields and xenophobic nationalism are contemporary terms evoking images of the past. As the experiences of today elicit haunting echoes of the past, there is an urgent need to educate the public about what prejudice can and did lead to during the Shoah."

The 21 participants included historians, educators and museologists from six countries: Austria, Canada, Czech Republic, Germany and Slovakia who met in Vienna to exchange interpretations of educational resources and attend workshops.

The seminar was structured around Visualizing Memory...a last detail, an educational video produced by the Kleinmann Family Foundation in cooperation with the MHMC and accompanied by pedagogical guides and an academic text, co-authored by Naomi Kramer and Ronald Headland. Using the experiences of Montreal's Peter Kleinmann, a survivor of the Shoah, the video examines topics of both contemporary and historic relevance. The video had previously been shown at several academic conferences.

Kramer said enthusiasm and commitment to the outreach was so great that a second seminar is scheduled to take place in Munich, Oct. 26 to 31. It is being organized by German participants Dr. Robert Sigel and Peter Hagedorn in conjunction with Kramer, education director of the MHMC.

Anti-racism awards presented

By DAVID J. LITVAK
Special to The CJN

VANCOUVER — Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), Pacific region and the Vancouver Holocaust Education Centre were both recipients of the first annual B.C. Eliminates Racism Together Recognition Awards.

The awards were presented recently by Multiculturalism B.C. in a two-hour ceremony to commemorate the Day for the Elimination of Racism.

CJC received its award for its Anti-Racism Education Outreach Project, while the Holocaust Education Centre was cited for heightening awareness of the Holocaust by staging mock Nuremberg trials. Awards were presented to five other organizations.

According to Patsy George, director of Multiculturalism B.C., "the purpose of the awards is to recognize initiatives that have contributed to the elimination of racism in communities throughout the province."

Ujjal Dosanjh, attorney general of British Columbia and minister responsible for multiculturalism, human rights and immigration presented the awards.

Marilyn Berger, associate director of CJC Pacific region, accepted the award on behalf of CJC.

CJC talked to students, communities about anti-racism education

In a later interview with The CJN, Berger explained that CJC travelled across B.C. "to talk to students and communities about anti-racism education, teaching the lessons of the Holocaust and incorporating those lessons into fighting racism and hatred today."

Berger led CJC's anti-racism delegation to five towns in B.C. to speak to high school students and adults. The delegation also included Holocaust survivors Bronia Sonnenschein and Robert Waisman as well as Sandy Dore, a representative of the B.C. Teachers Federation Program Against Racism.

Chochinov Park win first round in fight against development

By MYRON LOVE
Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Supporters of a north Winnipeg park named for a Jewish farm family from the area have won the first round in their battle to save the park from developers.

Recently, area city councillors turned down an application by Asper Properties to purchase the 3.37-acre park and build a Canadian Tire outlet on the site. About 100 residents and family members attended the meeting to oppose the development.

Chochinov Park was named after the Chochinov family, which operated a dairy farm on the site from 1914 until the mid-1950s. The family sold the land to the city in the early 1980s. In addition to the park, there are also two restaurants on the south edge of the old Chochinov property and a Safeway and Wal-Mart to the west. The park was dedicated four years ago.

"It is an historic site as far as our family is concerned," says Lou Chochinov, who grew up on the farm. "We have put up as much of a fight as we can to stop this development. People in this area are up in arms. The matter has to go to the city's Parks and Recreation committee from here. The city spent money to develop this park. It is unfortunate that the developer has enough pull that the development will probably proceed."

Don Armstrong, a spokesperson for the Department of Parks and Recreation, said sites should not be given official names until their long-term use is considered. Names cause neighborhoods and communities to develop an attraction to a site, he noted.

Sensitive situation

"A situation like this is always sensitive," he said. "The family and neighborhood feels that the city is not following through with the original proposal. On the other hand, we have a company that is willing to build a $12-million store here that would contribute $400,000 a year to the city in realty taxes."

Armstrong says the Asper group's original proposal would have been rejected by councillors in any case because it would have taken up the entire park site. A new proposal brought forth by the developer would only use the southern half of the park site that has not been developed yet.

At the same time, money would be put in to further landscape the remaining park land and create more of a memorial square with photos and a history of the Chochinov family. Currently, the only commemoration is a boulder with a plaque on it which is far from the nearest street, Armstrong says.

A treatise on the history of Hungary's Jews

BY BILL GLADSTONE
Special to the CJN

The Jews of Hungary: History, Culture, Psychology, by Raphael Patai (Wayne State University Press) is a 720-page treatise that traces the history of the Jews of the Carpathian basin from their origin in Roman times to their near-obliteration in 1944 and beyond, right up to the present.

Patai a distinguished anthropologist-historian who has written a shelf of works on Judaic subjects died recently at 86. This book must certainly stand as one of his finest. He wrote it, he explains, to compensate for the relative neglect of the subject by many Jewish historians, including Graetz, Dubnow and Baron.

From the earliest moment on, Patai's confident hand paints both the big and small pictures, so that we feel the grand sweep of history with all of its irrepressible momentum, even as we are introduced to an intriguing cavalcade of characters who inhabit this rich, promising, but ultimately tragic story.

Thus, we meet the Mendels, a hereditary succession of seven Jewish prefects who served as liaison between medieval kahal and king. We meet Jewish physicians, criminals and other types to 1800, and thereafter a veritable Who's Who of Hungarian-Jewish writers, editors, journalists, artists, scholars, physicians, lawyers, industrialists, merchants and financiers.

When the Turks conquered much of what was then Hungary in 1526, the Jews were evidently spared the wrath of the Muslim scimitar. Although thousands were removed as captives to Turkey, more than 100 Jewish families were permitted to remain in Buda.

After the Turks were repelled in 1686, Hungary joined the Austro-Hungarian dynasty and tens of thousands of Jews from the neighboring territories of Moravia, Bohemia and Austria repopulated the Hungarian countryside.

The Habsburg monarchs were deeply ambivalent toward the Jews. In 1746, Maria Theresa signed an order of expulsion against the Jews of Buda and imposed an annual toleration tax upon every Jewish head in the empire.

Later in her 40-year reign (1740-80) she enacted protective measures as well. Her son Joseph II, who reigned from 1780 to 1790, ushered in an era of reform and emancipation, and in 1788 ordered Jews to adopt Germanic family names. Roughly a century later, many Jews 'Magyarized' their names to reflect their sense of inclusion in Hungarian society.

Although the revolution of 1848 brought with it manifestations of anti-Semitism, the Jews participated wholeheartedly in the popular uprising. Especially after their legal emancipation in 1867, they participated fully in academic life, medicine, the arts, the economy and the trades. Within the multi-ethnic Austro-Hungarian Empire, the Jews were a valuable ally to the Hungarian Magyars in their quest to become a majority in their own country.

Not even Theodore Herzl, born in Pest in 1860, could persuade any sizeable proportion of Hungarian Jewry to surrender their deeply-rooted sense of Hungarian nationalism for psychological membership in the dream-state of Israel. As Patai chronicles, they considered themselves full-fledged and patriotic "Magyars of the Mosaic faith."

The period from 1867 to 1914 was a golden era for Hungarian Jewry, whose members yearned for social equality as never before, even in their admissibility to the Uri (gentlemanly) class of Hungarian society. Jews, especially those with money, became barons and counts and fought duels; many converted to Christianity. For the Jews, this was a time of intellectual fermentation, upward mobility and increasing migration from village to city.

The golden era ended with WWI, when Hungary lost two-thirds of its territory and the Jews lost their strategic importance as a group tipping the balance in favor of a Magyar majority. Reduced to despondency and bitterness, the country began looking for scapegoats. The denouement was swift.

Numerus Clausus, the first racial law, came in 1920; others followed beginning in 1938. Late in the Nazi era, in 1944, nearly two-thirds of Hungary's 775,000 Jews were deported and killed. It was because Hungary's Jews clung stubbornly to their nationalistic patriotism, Patai explains, that so many were ultimately caught in the Nazi's baleful trap.

Hungarian-Jewish family traced in new chronicle

BY BILL GLADSTONE
Special to the CJN

As Montreal-area author Elaine Kalman Naves was preparing to write the book that became Journey To Vaja: Reconstructing the World of a Hungarian-Jewish Family (McGill — Queen's University Press), she considered carefully whether to present the story as a non-fiction chronicle or as a novel.

The book tells the story of the Weinbergers, a farming family that for two centuries lived in the Nyirseg, a sandy region between the Great Hungarian Plain and the foothills of the Carpathians. The Nazis deported nearly half a million Hungarian Jews, including the Weinbergers, to death camps in the spring of 1944.

Hungarian-Jewish family chronicled in docu-novel of her own family, this is one woman's poignant search for her roots. "I became very interested in writing it after I had my first daughter," she explains. "I wanted my daughter to know about her past."

In doing the research, Naves conducted more than 150 interviews, including many with her father, Gusti Weinberger, one of the few members of a vast extended family to survive the Nazi era. She also did much archival and historical research and visited Hungary three times.

The book also relies upon a packet of some 100 letters written between family members in the 1930s and 1940s. Most were penned in the six painful weeks of the Nazis' frenetic annihilation of Hungarian Jews in April and May of 1944, which Winston Churchill described as "probably the greatest and most horrible crime ever committed in the whole history of the world."

Naves focuses more on the vibrant life of Hungary's Jews than on how they died. She wrote Journey to Vaja in a style that she describes as "narrative non-fiction." While the book has "reconstructed" conversations and details of life of centuries past, she asserts that nothing was made up and that every word is backed up by reliable human or documentary sources.

"Some people call this type of book 'creative non-fiction' or the 'non-fiction novel,'" she says. "What it means is that you're completely wedded to telling the truth, but you're telling it in a narrative way because a lot of readers enjoy acquiring information by means of a story."

For Naves, a writer and journalist, it was important not to tell her family saga as a novel because "I wanted the reader to trust me and to trust that I'm telling a true story."

Naves said the stories that her father (who died in 1990) and a cousin of her grandmother had told her contained the voices of many long-dead ancestors, relatives and others. "There were already voices and dialogue passed down in these stories. I wasn't inventing it. All I had to do was translate it from the Hungarian into English."

Complete with photographs, family charts and maps, Journey to Vaja is family history at its most vivid. CBC radio ran an hour-long documentary based on the book last fall.

Concert introduces new chazzan

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Shlomo Sufrin (left) and Yaakov Motzen. [Barry Shainbaum photo]

TORONTO — The new chazzan on the block last week gave a tantalizing foretaste of what he will bring to Toronto's cantorial scene.

Cantor Yaakov Motzen, who has been at Shomrim Laboker-Beth Yehuda-Shaare Tefillah Congregation in Montreal since 1978, will assume the position of cantor of Shaarei Shomayim Congregation July 1. If his performance at the annual Mizrachi concert is any indication, the community is in for a treat.

From a heartbreakingly tender plea Bring Him Home, a song begging G-d to bring a young Israeli soldier home safely, to traditional chazzanut like Yossele Rosenblatt's Elokai Neshamo and Samuel Vigoda and Moshe Stern's Shomer Yisroel to a lilting Israeli piece Hechalil, Motzen showed a range of musical taste and style that had the audience spellbound.

He moved from a deep baritone to a full-voiced high tenor to a falsetto with facility and ease, displaying a seeming lack of effort that kept the audience relaxed and smiling.

A highlight was Lo Tida Milchama, a wish for peace, that ranged from a gentle yearning to an almost military climax.

Even Yiddish was included in the program, with a delightful version of Hamavdil, from the Havdalah service after Shabbat, that Motzen livened up by switching accents during the song from the Litvishe a guute volk to the Galicianer a gitte volk.

Shlomo Sufrin, assistant chazzan at Shaarei Shomayim, who is carving out a very successful career in the modern, up-tempo "Yeshivish" Jewish music using the name Shlomo Simcha, more of a showman than Motzen, gave a beautiful rendition of the blessing of the Kohanim.

His Lecha Eten, a song asserting that G-d has promised the land of Israel to the Jews, was sung with a verve and enthusiasm that had the audience clapping and rocking in their seats.

The Cudyk Weinberg Memorial Scholarships, designed for students graduating from day schools and planning to study in Israel, were presented by Paul Brown, president of Toronto Mizrachi and Stanley Zlotnick, Weinberg's son-in-law, to Beth Jacob student Mindy Simon and Talia Rosenfield from Ulpanat Orot.

The Max Zeifman memorial scholarships, also given to students planning to study in Israel, were presented by Sol and Sam Zeifman and national Mizrachi chair Kurt Rothschild to Aaron Winter, from CHAT, and Tehila Adams of Ulpanat Orot.

Zeifman, who died last year, was a dedicated worker for Mizrachi, and religious Zionist causes, and had a special affection for the concert.

In his memory, Shaarei Shomayim donated a sefer Torah to a hesder yeshivah in Dimona.

Genetic engineering raises ethical concerns

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The appearance of new diseases, the creation of a super race, and abuses by insurance companies and employers were some of the concerns voiced at a recent panel on genetic engineering held at Temple Sinai Congregation.

Taking part in the discussion were synagogue Senior Rabbi Lawrence Colton; Alan Bernstein, director of the Samuel Lunenfeld Research Institute at Mount Sinai Hospital and a specialist in genetic research; and Gilbert Sharpe, director of legal services at the Ontario Ministry of Health.

They were speaking at the second of a three-part series called A Jewish Response to Biomedical Ethical Concerns that was a part of the synagogue's 1997 adult education program.

While most of those attending the program saw great possibility for the prevention and treatment of disease, they were concerned about who would control future technologies, and about the costs, not just financial, but ethical and legal as well.

Clones were a major issue, with people questioning such matters as the cloned person's possible relationship with his or her siblings and society as a whole.

These concerns are very real, the panelists said.

Bernstein said there are 100,000 genes in the human body — the blueprints for "an amazingly complex" system. "To tamper with any part of that is complicated, because we don't know what else we will affect."

The real issue, he said, in many cases, is how much of a person's natural ability or nature is from the genes and how much is from their upbringing or the world around them.

Bernstein pointed out that even if we know that a certain gene predisposes one to a disease or condition, there is seldom an absolute guarantee that the person will develop it.

Doctors can now identify those people who will most likely develop breast cancer. "But we can't do anything about it," Bernstein said. "So should we still offer that test?"

On the other hand, we can prevent colon cancer in those genetically susceptible; so being tested can "remove anxiety from those with that genetic mutation."

Sharpe outlined some of the legal questions about DNA testing, such as screening people out of certain jobs, or insurance companies who might charge higher fees or refuse insurance entirely to certain people,

Is there an obligation, he asked, for people to be tested genetically before marriage, for such diseases as Tay-Sachs? "Can society say that you must be tested, and then [if the test shows your child will have a certain disease] say you must have an abortion or society won't take responsibility for its care?"

There are laws in Canada, particularly in human rights codes, which can be adapted to protect against abuses, and several states in the United States, as well as the federal government there, have issued prohibitions against cloning of human beings, or in some cases, restricting genetic engineering altogether.

Sharpe's concern is that in the rush to prevent abuses, "we will wind up prohibiting constructive genetic engineering too."

Sharpe said that "if it is demonstrated that a certain procedure or test can help us, by preventing or curing disease, laws say that they must be covered by health insurance."

Rabbi Colton said he is concerned about whether economic considerations will overshadow moral principles.

"We all know that the highest principle [in Judaism] is the saving of a life," the rabbi said. Medical services are deemed essential for a community, Sabbath laws can be suspended when a life is threatened (even potentially threatened), the training of doctors and the establishment of hospitals is considered essential, as is providing for future contingencies.

There are already responsa for genetic problems. "For instance, if we indeed know that a child will be born, suffer and die (from Tay-Sachs, for instance), then abortion is recommended — and all authorities agree with that."

But Judaism does not say that one is obligated to be tested, he said, because that would invade the privacy of an individual.

While genetic testing for the sake of potentially saving a human life is allowed, Rabbi Colton said, all testing must be judged by that parameter. "If the reason is neutral, or creates that which was not meant to be created, it is forbidden."

Mastectomy fashion show planned

TORONTO – The third annual Shoppers Home Health Care Mastectomy Fashion Show will take place on April 23, at 7:30 p.m., in the Churchill Ballroom at the Delta Chelsea Inn, 33 Gerrard St. W.

Admission and refreshments are free, and there will be door prizes.

Guest speaker will be Sharon Hampson, of Sharon, Lois and Bram fame. Founding president of Willow, the Ontario Breast Cancer Support and Resource Centre, and honorary chair of the North York General Hospital Breast Diagnostic Centre campaign, Hampson will discuss her personal experience with breast cancer.

The evening will be hosted by Arlene Bynon of CHFI FM98.

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. I am trying to eat more fruit and vegetables, but find them difficult to buy in the winter months, as well as expensive. What do you suggest?

A. Fruits and vegetables do not have to be fresh to provide vitamins, minerals and fibre. Canned and frozen produce are just as healthful and may even be the fresher choice during winter months. Enjoy!

Q. I try to include a variety of foods in my diet, but some days I am too rushed to eat as well as I know I should. I am wondering whether it would be worthwhile for me to take a multivitamin?

A. Taking a multivitamin can provide you with necessary vitamins and minerals on a daily basis. However, do not let it be an excuse for letting your diet diminish. Greater benefits are derived from the vitamins and minerals that we eat in food than from the ones we take in a supplement.

One reason for this is that the, in combination and may work together to provide their protective effects. While a multivitamin can be appropriate, be careful not to let it replace a healthy, balanced diet.

Overcoming stuttering

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Imagine knowing what you want to say but not being able to get the words out.

"People who have never stuttered can not imagine the pain, fear, rejection, and humiliation that a person who stutters feels" says Charles Marcus, 45, who has stuttered most of his life.

Marcus describes his youth as "a nightmare." Growing up in Manchester, England, his parents tried traditional speech therapy, which he says did not work.

Although speech therapy has been successful for many stutterers, Marcus says there are "a significant number of people like myself who did not overcome their impediment."

Speaking slowly but with no trace of stuttering, Marcus explains that when he was in his 30s, he decided to take matters into his own hands, as the stuttering was "physically, emotionally and mentally" ruining his life.

Over a three-year period, he began studying successful speakers, experimenting with different approaches and finding techniques for breathing and projecting sound, as well as examining ways to reduce tension and anxiety.

"I completely changed my attitude to speaking, my whole way of speaking, and my lifestyle. I have been fluent since 1987 and I became a much calmer and confident person."

Marcus has spoken to stuttering self-help groups and to non-stuttering groups and organizations about stuttering in the hope of bringing public awareness and understanding. He contributes articles to magazines and newsletters and has become an advocate for those who stutter.

By sharing his personal experiences and having an awareness of the problems stutterers face, he says that "if I can help in a small way to save one person the fear and humiliation I suffered, then it will be worth it."

Last year, Marcus established the Speech Development Centre, which offers programs and workshops using the approaches and techniques that have worked for him as well as for other people.

Working with small groups, he presents a one-day workshop which includes a motivational session and teaches the basics of his approach, concepts, and principals.

For those who stutter severely and require further help, he offers a four-day intensive immersion program. With commitment, dedication and a lot of practice, it is possible to control a stutter and maintain fluent speech, he says.

He explains that there are different kinds of stuttering — hesitation, repetition, blocking of a word or avoidance by changing to another word.

Experts give different explanations for stuttering. Some say it is physical, others say it is emotional and yet others believe it is a combination of both.

Marcus believes that first, a positive attitude is needed to attack a speech impediment. "You must remove your negative thoughts and doubts. From their experiences, people who stutter have a low self-esteem and their increasing fear and anxiety creates even more problems."

This year, Marcus will be the keynote speaker at a major conference on stuttering in the United States, and he's been invited to run a workshop in August in Saint John, N.B. at the Canadian Stuttering Conference.

The sugar from cane
Will effect your brain;
If in a bad mood
Just change your food
The decision of the panel
Is change the channel!
From junk food and sugar blues,
Which will only cook your goose.

Nuts, seeds, legumes and fruit
Will keep you in a tranquil mood,
Veggies and a variety of grains
Will bring you each day healthful gains;
A well balanced, whole and natural meal
Will keep your spirits on even keel.

Smart bacteria fight antibiotic,
Thus losing your immunity is idiotic.
Cut down on hormone-laden meat;
Instead do fish and tofu eat.

Don't take a pill!
Exercise your will!
Cut out static and frantic noise
And listen to your inner voice;
Become quiet like babies with nipples,
Calm like sea without ripples.
When such a lifestyle is our choice
The almighty rewards us with mental poise,
He will bless with longevity and sound health;
Is there in all the world any better wealth?

PM revives talk of national unity government

By SARAH HONIG
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu once more revived speculation about a national unity coalition last weekend, when he told television interviewers that he had not yet reached a decision on whether to invite Labor to join his government.

He said he is weighing the options and expects to make up his mind soon. Netanyahu then went on to supply reasons both for and against the national unity option.

A new rumor was also floated that Labor party leader Shimon Peres might agree to join the government without his party, if he fails to win central committee majority for such a move. The Prime Minister's Office has denied this.

Peres has been an enthusiastic advocate of unity and the consensus in Labor is that he wants to have his party join the government before a new party leader is elected in the June 3 primary. He would thus become the senior Labor minister and retain a seat in the cabinet no matter who is elected in his stead. For this reason, too, front-running leadership candidate MK Ehud Barak opposes a national unity coalition.

The prime minister's statements intensified the turmoil in Labor and served to polarize divided opinions even further. Barak accused Netanyahu of chicanery, while Peres expressed confidence that he can muster a majority in Labor for joining the Netanyahu government.

Speaking from Italy, Netanyahu used scheduled interviews on both TV stations at peak viewing time to refer to national unity.

He said he was in a quandary.

"I have been weighing the matter, but I have not yet decided. I have consulted colleagues and several ministers...some have clear views and others are undecided, as I am." He said he expects to reach a conclusion soon.

The advantage of a national unity government, he said, lies in the fact that "if we indeed enter final-status negotiations, these will be the most critical in the state's history, and we must then ask whether expanding the government will improve our ability to conduct these negotiations and conclude them."

However, Netanyahu said he is also well aware of the dangers. "We might end up with a situation in which there are two centres of power inside the government, which Arafat will just play against each other."

Barak lambasted Netanyahu for "speaking disingenuously. He knows it is nothing but base trickery to foment more discord inside Labor and to confuse the general public. He knows the positions of the large parties are too far apart and he is not ready for a total radical overhaul of the government guidelines, which is what it would take to get Labor to join the government.

"Netanyahu would have to get up and admit he is an utter failure in everything. He would have to say that he was wrong about everything from the outset and to change his policy accordingly. This does not seem likely. National unity is a facade, a sure recipe for a government of shame. Responsible government under Netanyahu is a contradiction in terms."

Barak said he is sure "19 out of every 20 Labor members are dead set against national unity."

MK Avraham Shohat, a leading Barak supporter, referred to another aspect of the question. "No move whatever is possible until the Bar-On affair is finally over for good," he said. "We don't know when that will be and it is unlikely that this government will escape untarnished, even if there are no indictments."

Barak's chief opponent in the race for Labor leader, MK Yossi Beilin, also opposes national unity, saying that "instead of national unity, we will get national paralysis."

But from Sao Paolo, Brazil, where he is vacationing, Peres sounded upbeat about his ability to bring his party to approve national unity.

Peres noted in radio interviews that "an official invitation still has not come from Netanyahu and nothing can begin until he makes his decision. We cannot initiate this."

He dismissed the notion of Arafat's playing both ends of the government against each other. "There will not be two governments, but one, which will operate on the basis of new, agreed-on guidelines, not the guidelines of the present government."

Peres expressed confidence that "there is a majority in Labor for joining a national unity government, just as there is a large solid majority for such a government in the general public."

Sources close to Peres hinted he might consider joining the government on his own — as Moshe Dayan entered the Begin government in 1977 — if Labor refuses to join. They intimated that such an offer had been made by Netanyahu, who is very interested in having Peres in the government to give it the same legitimacy abroad as Dayan gave Begin.

Inside the government, tension mounted with the resumed unity speculation. Likud partner Tsomet announced that it was against a national unity government.

High court ruling keeps Bar-Ilan open

By HAIM SHAPIRO and JERUSALEM POST STAFF

JERUSALEM — The High Court of Justice last week overturned Transport Minister Yitzhak Levy's decision that Jerusalem's Rehov Bar-Ilan be closed to traffic during prayer times on Shabbat and holidays.

At the same time, a majority of the seven-member justice panel said that if a solution could be found for the secular residents of the street and the neighborhoods along it — court president Aharon Barak suggested issuing them with special decals that would allow them to drive during the hours the street is closed to other traffic — Levy's decision could stand.

Security for Barak and the other six justices was increased following the decision, Israel Radio reported.

In this decision, Justice Tsevi Tal — the court's only religious justice — who wrote a separate opinion upholding the total closure of the street on Shabbat and holidays, joined Barak and justices Shlomo Levin and Eliyahu Mazza for pragmatic reasons.

Justices Theodor Or, Mishael Cheshin and Dalia Dorner opposed closing the street under any circumstances.

In his majority opinion, Barak wrote that if there were not alternate routes to Rehov Bar-Ilan, a main traffic artery linking the northern and northeastern parts of the city with downtown and the Jerusalem-Tel Aviv highway, the street could not be closed. He noted, however, that alternate routes do exist, and add at most a few extra minutes of travel time.

He added that if the possibility of closing either of the two alternate routes, which also pass near haredi areas, on Shabbat is raised, the Bar-Ilan case would be reopened. He also said there must be no interference with Shabbat traffic on Bar-Ilan during non-prayer times and that security and emergency vehicles can use the street at any time.

The three justices in the minority argued that Bar-Ilan is a major artery and not a neighborhood street, which can be closed on Shabbat. They said such an artery cannot be considered the "private property" of the people who live along it, and that the fact that the smaller streets in these neighborhood are closed is a sufficient compromise.

Last night, about 100 Haredim demonstrated along Bar-Ilan as dozens of policemen stood by. On several side streets off the main thoroughfare, haredi youths set garbage bins alight and threw stones and bottles at police cars. No one was injured and two youths were arrested.

Yehuda Meshi-Zahav, the so-called "operations officer" of the Eda Haredit, predicted a "hot" summer, with protests and demonstrations, as a result of the ruling.

"This is the first time that the High Court has determined the weather," Meshi-Zahav said, adding he had not expected a favorable ruling and predicting there would continue to be protests as long as there is traffic on the street on Shabbat.

Ornan Yekutieli, the Meretz Jerusalem City Council member who has spearheaded the fight to keep the street open to traffic, promised that haredi action would be met with counter-action.

"If the Haredim start to make pogroms, we will return to the street," he said.

Jerusalem district police chief Cmdr. Yair Yitzhaki said the police would enforce the court's decision even if it is necessary to act with a heavy hand against demonstrators. At the same time, he asked for a meeting with Meshi-Zahav in an effort to ensure that the Shabbat before Pesach, traditionally known as Shabbat Hagadol, would not be a violent one.

Attorney general Elyakim Rubinstein called for restraint and for obeying the law on Bar-Ilan. He said in a statement that, while the law enforcement authorities would certainly show restraint, it is first incumbent upon the residents — without infringing on their right to demonstrate — to avoid breaking the law. He appealed on the Eda Haredit leadership to do so, saying, "This, too, is the path of Torah."

Levy expressed surprise that the court said he had not fully considered the needs of the secular residents of nearby areas. Levy noted that there had been two commissions and numerous other studies of the issue.

In light of the court's ruling that the street could be closed during synagogue services if the needs of nearby secular residents are met, Levy is expected to call an urgent meeting of Transport Ministry staff, police and city officials to discuss ways to implement this, probably with a system of special stickers for secular residents.

Ashkenazi Chief Rabbi Yisrael Lau expressed disappointment at the court's decision, but also called for no violence of any kind. Sephardi Chief Rabbi Eliahu Bakshi-Doron said it is up to Levy to prevent desecration of the Sabbath.

Meretz leader Yossi Sarid said the court had proven for the umpteenth time that there are responsible, wise and brave judges in Jerusalem. He said the secular public has been willing to accept a compromise all along, but the Haredim want no compromise with the secular public.

Residents upset by ruling

By ARYEH DEAN COHEN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — "Haters of Israel" was only one of the epithets used by haredi residents on Jerusalem's Rehov Bar-Ilan to describe the High Court of Justice hours after the decision to keep the street open on Shabbat.

"It's like it says in Ecclesiastes, justice and evil go hand in hand," said Shimon Meir, of the nearby Shmuel Hanavi project. "It's okay to give half of the country to the Palestinians to make peace. But to make peace between Jews, they can't give back 200-300 metres.

"What are people asking for? That once a week there be a little quiet for the people who live here. All week long the road is busy. People who live here need a break, religious or secular. In Dizengoff, they closed down a street and made it a pedestrian mall. There it's okay because they're secular, but here it's forbidden."

"It's just terrible I'm stunned," said Avraham Fuchs, a local resident, as he took his daughter to a store on the street. "There's a road that bypasses this place. Only Haredim live here. If it was a place where secular and observant people lived together, that might be different. It's inhumane, even from a logical point of view. We won't use violence, but we will demonstrate in a legal manner."

"When it comes to dealing with Esau, Jacob our father used gifts, prayers, and battle," said Haim, who did not to give his last name. "We don't have anyone to give gifts to, but we'll use prayer and battle."

Nurit Maman, of Katamon, who was taking her daughter into a drugstore at the Bar-Ilan/Shmuel Hanavi intersection said however, "The decision to keep the street open was the wisest one possible," she said. "I hope they'll be able to bear up to the pressure. We [secular Jews] have the right to exist as well. They can live without us having to suffer for it. We can all live in the same city, with everyone living in their own neighborhoods. The road must stay open, because it's a major artery."

Hanan Rivkin, of Ramat Eshkol, agreed, saying he is "all in favor of the decision, because [Bar-Ilan] is one of two exits from my neighborhood, so it's a great time-saver."

"It was developed as a main thoroughfare. If you want to make me an alternate thoroughfare that will get me to Hadassah on Shabbat, fine, but otherwise, this main artery must stay open," said his wife, Helen.

But Meir Sirotta, of Sanhedria said, "This decision hurts a lot, and I don't think the haredi public will stand for it. [They will] launch a huge campaign against it. The High Court of Justice won't decide about Shabbat, which God gave us. It's not up to them to decide such things."

Bar-Ilan kiosk owner Shoshana Ben-David said "I think it's a big mistake to make such a ruling against observant people, because they're stubborn and they'll go out to demonstrate, and that will lead to a civil war. They'll throw themselves in front of cars if necessary.

"When the Haredim yell 'Nazis' at the police, this hurts me a lot. The road being open causes a rift between the Jews. When they come to blows, when they hit soldiers or the police, it also hurts me. Who are the police? They are Jews, the soldiers are Jews — they're our brothers," she said.

A resident who refused to give her name, said "We live here, and while we don't demonstrate, we suffer a great deal from both the traffic and the demonstrations. We're not against anybody; we're part of the Jewish people, and we'd like to see them live in peace in this country. I don't think this is the most important problem this country needs to deal with, but it's my problem because I live here. Unfortunately, now it won't get any better."

FOUR MISSING SONS — FOUR PAINFUL QUESTIONS

• WHY ARE THESE SONS DIFFERENT FROM ALL OTHER SONS?

On June 11, 1982, Zachary, Tzvi, and Yehuda were taken captive in the Battle of Sultan Yaqub, in Syrian controlled Lebanon. Later that day AP International, La Stampa, and Time Magazine, reported that three Israeli soldiers were paraded through the streets of Damascus. "Their hands and ankles were chained. They looked deeply saddened if not shamed by their plight..." (Time Magazine correspondent, Dean Brelis). On October 16, 1986, Ron Arad was captured after his plane went down over Lebanon.

• WHY ARE THESE PRISONERS DIFFERENT FROM OTHER PRISONERS?

Since 1993 Israel has demonstrated her goodwill by releasing thousands of Palestinian prisoners, but has not received even the most basic information about her missing men. Although officially listed as MIAs, Israel's missing soldiers have been treated as hostages. In violation of the Geneva Conventions, none of the men has been allowed a single visit from any humanitarian organization.

• WHY ARE THESE HOSTAGES DIFFERENT FROM OTHER HOSTAGES?

In 1991 Israel was instrumental in helping secure the release of all the remaining American and European hostages being held in Lebanon. Those hostages returned home while the Israeli MIAs still remain in captivity.

• WHY MUST THIS PASSOVER BE DIFFERENT FROM ALL OTHERS?

This must be the last Passover that the Israeli MIAs celebrate redemption while in captivity.

Israeli army faces uphill battle in Lebanon

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mideast Analysis

A year ago this month, following 16 days of fierce cross-border battles in Operation Grapes of Wrath, an uneasy truce settled over Israel's last active front, Lebanon.

Both sides, Israel and Hezbollah, have more or less abided by the unsigned ceasefire agreement, having largely refrained from bombarding each other's civilian areas. But in all other respects, the often bloody status quo ante remains in force.

A mini-war rages in southern Lebanon, as it has since the early 1980s, consuming the lives of Israeli soldiers. In 1996, 27 Israeli troops fell in battle, compared to six so far this year. This figure excludes the 73 servicemen who perished in last February's mid-air collision of two Israeli helicopters near the Lebanese frontier, a tragedy which intensified the debate over Israel's role in its self-declared security zone in southern Lebanon.

Proponents of a unilateral Israeli withdrawal argue that in this era of long-range rockets Israel's northern frontier can be secured by less costly means. They further claim that, in maintaining its enclave, Israel encourages Iran to finance Hezbollah's operations and prompts Syria — the predominant foreign power in Lebanon — to give Hezbollah political, moral and logistical support.

This group cuts across Israeli party lines and includes Interior Minister Avigdor Kahalani, Yossi Beilin of the Labor party, Ran Cohen of the Meretz party, several high-ranking former intelligence officers and Yisrael Harel of the Council of Jewish Settlements in Judea, Samaria and Gaza.

By all accounts, the right-of-centre members of this informal coalition fear that a unilateral pullback would exert unbearable pressure on Israel to withdraw from the Golan Heights, whose fate is inextricably linked with that of southern Lebanon.

Opposing them is a group led by Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, who in vain has called on Syria to rein in Hezbollah, and whose Lebanon First diplomatic initiative died at birth last summer. Netanyahu's bedfellows are Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai, Chief of Staff Gen. Amnon Shahak, Israel's chief point man in Lebanon, Uri Lubrani, and Ehud Barak, Shimon Peres' successor-in-waiting of the Labor party.

They believe that a unilateral withdrawal would be unwise, not only because it would bring Hezbollah perilously close to the Israeli border but because a lasting arrangement must include the participation of Lebanon and Syria.

Seventy-nine percent of Israelis agree with them, judging from a survey published in the Tel Aviv daily Maariv recently.

There is another way out for Israel: the deployment of the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon (UNIFIL) to the international border, as called for in UN Security Council Resolution 425, passed in the wake of Israel's invasion of southern Lebanon in 1978 (Operation Litani). But for a number of reasons, Israel has not complied with this resolution.

In the absence of a political solution, the skirmishes go on, with no end in sight. Hezbollah fighters penetrate the security enclave at will, and once there plant increasingly-effective radio-controlled road-side bombs and lay ambushes, disabling Israeli patrols and convoys with rockets, mortars and missiles they receive from Iran via Syria. Hezbollah leader Sheikh Hassan Nasrallah has warned Israel that the "war of attrition" will continue.

To counter Hezbollah, Israel has doubled its troop strength (to about 2,000), changed its patrol tactics and moved combat troops around by helicopter. And now all Israeli troops headed for Lebanon must undergo special anti-guerrilla training.

Israel, however, appears to be fighting an uphill battle in the hostile environment of southern Lebanon. Hezbollah has broadened its influence there by providing social services to the poor and, with the help of the local population, has improved its intelligence-gathering skills, all at Israel's expense.

The Week in Israel

Apr. 7

• Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu began a visit to the United States in an effort to restart peace talks with Palestinian Authority leader Yasser Arafat. President Bill Clinton planned to ask Netanyahu to postpone all settlement activity in exchange for a Palestinian crackdown on terrorists and a resumption of talks.

•An Israeli-Arab woman, already raising 17 children, is pregnant with quintuplets.

April 8

• Two Palestinians were killed and over 100 wounded in clashes with Israeli troops in Hebron. The clashes were sparked by the death of another Arab earlier in the day, when two Jewish seminary students opened fire.

• Netanyahu returned to Israel after holding a "frank, candid and long talk" with Clinton. Netanyahu proposed moving directly to expedited final-status talks with the Palestinians to revive the peace process.

• An Israeli lawmaker demanded an investigation of a rabbi's religious ruling that supports suicide attacks made by Jews.

April 9

• Violence continued in Hebron as Israeli soldiers wounded some 30 Palestinian in clashes. An Israeli border police officer and photographer were also hurt.

• Jordanian police detained 11 youths accused of planning a terrorist attack on Israel's embassy in Amman.

April 13

• Two Israelis and a Palestinian were lightly wounded when a Palestinian woman opened fire during a security check at the Allenby crossing at the Israeli-Jordanian border. The woman, who was arrested after the shooting, was a resident of the West Bank town of Kalkilya.

• Sharon Edri, the Israeli soldier whose body was found after the arrest of Hamas members, was buried with full military honors.

Rabbinical Assembly slams conversion bill

By MICHAEL GELBWASSER
The Jewish Advocate

BOSTON — The debate over conversion in Israel took centre stage in Boston as members of the Conservative movement's Rabbinical Assembly, which recently held its annual convention in Cambridge, protested outside the Consulate General of Israel to New England.

About 200 Conservative rabbis — and at least one Reform sympathizer — called the demonstration to protest against the passage during the first reading of a bill in the Knesset that would bar non-Orthodox rabbis from conducting conversions in Israel.

Such conversions have long been banned in Israel, but a Supreme Court ruling last year said they must be recognized. Conservative and Reform leaders accuse the Orthodox of wanting to block recognition by Israel of all non-Orthodox conversions, no matter where they are conducted.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu last week said that Conservative and Reform leaders were "misrepresenting" the bill.

The Conservative rabbis met with Bobby Brown, adviser to the prime minister for Diaspora Affairs. Netanyahu had met previously with Conservative leaders in Washington, D.C. Rabbi Gila Doro, a past president of the Rabbinical Assembly's Israel region who attended the meeting, said the prime minister heard the rabbis and "understood we were concerned about the spiritual welfare of the Jewish people."

Brown and Knesset member Alexander Lubovsky met with Conservative and Reform leaders in New York last week.

Brown said their "exploratory talks" would be "an attempt to see if there can be a way of avoiding both litigation and legislation. With that, there are a lot of 'ifs.'"

The protest marked the fourth time in three days that Conservative rabbis worldwide voiced to Israeli officials their outrage over the conversion bill. While the bill as currently written does not affect Israel's recognition of non-Orthodox conversions done in the Diaspora, Conservative rabbis anticipate that a clause stating that Israel would not recognize these conversions either, will be added to the bill's final version.

Toronto rabbis

Rabbi Roy Tanenbaum of Toronto's Beth Tzedec Congregation was one of half a dozen Canadian rabbis to attend the protest. He has participated in demonstrations outside the Russian, Canadian and American embassies in the past, but the Israeli consulate was a "saddening" first.

"It takes a major sense that Israel is not going the right way in order to come out publicly and stand on the street," said Rabbi Tanenbaum. "[Those] pushing this bill have moved from Halachah to politics. To me that's devastating to the Jewish community at large."

After the protest, 10 of the Conservative rabbis met for about 30 minutes with Consul General Dan Kyram and Consul Ofra Farhi at Kyram's invitation. The rabbis argued that the conversion bill would cause a large rift in the Jewish community by redefining Israel as the homeland only for Orthodox Jews. The rabbis urged the Israeli government to recognize and accept non-Orthodox Jews as legitimate, "on the basis of justice, not on the basis of numbers."

Kyram noted that Knesset members sympathetic with the non-Orthodox cause hoped to reach "a compromise that would keep Jewish unity intact." However, he doubted that the haredi members — those who support the bill the strongest — would be willing to move from their position, saying that "when we talk about the Haredim, we can't look for flexibility. We all know that."

"I hope something will be found that will enable us all to live happily ever after," Kyram said.

During the protest, the rabbis blocked pedestrian traffic in front of the building in which the consulate is located. They held signs stating "Mr. Prime Minister, Keep Politics Out of Religion," and "Knesset: Don't Overstep Your Bounds," among other things. They also chanted songs such as Am Yisroel Chai and Hinei MaTov, recited the mourner's Kaddish, and blew a shofar.

Tucker read from the resolution the Assembly passed during the convention and asked Farhi to ensure that Netanyahu received it. She agreed.

"American Jews are worried about what's happening in Israel, and we are trying to do the best we can," Farhi said.

"People are pretty upset about it," said Rabbi Gary Karlin of Hamilton's Beth Jacob Congregation. "It's a very serious thing, and I think that my people understand that even those not touched by it directly are affected." Some of Beth Jacob's more active synagogue members are converts, he noted.

"I hope the long-term implications aren't as bad as I fear," he added. "I hope it doesn't represent a split between the haredi and the rest of the community."

Rabbi Philip Spectre, executive director of the Masorti movement in Israel, noted that non-Orthodox rabbis perform their conversions and wedding ceremonies according to Halachah and in a "very careful and responsible way." He predicted there would be "a great outcry" in Israel if the proposed bill passes.

"It means that Israeli law for the first time will explicitly discriminate against the non-Orthodox — I believe, for purely political reasons," added Rabbi Dr. Gil Nativ of Haifa. "They claim our conversions are non-halachic. That's a false claim. The real reason is the desire of Orthodoxy to maintain a monopoly" over performing conversions.

Renowned Bible scholar dies at age 92

By JERUSALEM POST STAFF

JERUSALEM — Prof. Nehama Leibowitz, the Bible scholar, Israel Prize winner, and much-loved teacher of Torah to thousands of students in Israel and abroad, died last week in Jerusalem at the age of 92.

Born in Latvia, she was educated at Berlin and Marburg universities, and immigrated here in 1925. From her early years, she worked in education, particularly adult education.

She gained worldwide popularity with her Gilyonot (sheets on the weekly Torah portion), which were mailed to students all over the world.

The sheets consisted of questions on the portion, to which students responded. For years, she personally checked each set of answers. She was also a popular lecturer and for a time spoke regularly on the radio, in addition to lecturing at several universities.

Leibowitz wrote more than a dozen books on the Bible, including her popular Studies series of commentary on each of the five books of the Torah.

In recognition of her research, she was awarded the Israel Prize for Education in 1957. She was also awarded the Samuel Rothberg prize in Jewish Education in 1986. She was buried in Jerusalem.

New sound on Samuels' latest CD

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

Richard Samuels

TORONTO — Several years ago while vacationing with his brother, Richard Samuels was at a bar in Tel Aviv listening to a piano player. During the musician's break, Samuels' brother encouraged him to get up and play.

"So I got up to play a couple of songs and the manager of the bar approached me and offered me a job," Samuels, 30, says from his home on Bathurst and Wilson here. Soon, with his brother as manager, Samuels was performing at a five-star hotel in Eilat. "It was a terrific experience for me performing American songs for Israelis and in the process I learned some Israeli songs." And the rest, as they say, is history.

Samuels has just released his second CD Now and is hoping to top the success he had with his 1993 debut self-titled CD which produced three charting singles including Missing You that climbed to number 11 and Between Friends which hit 18.

While his first album was a bit on the fluffy, over-produced side, Samuels decided to go a different direction with Now. "It's a more country format, a much different sounding record." This time around, Samuels went for a more stripped-down approach. "I wanted to see what my voice would sound like without the effects we used on the first album."

On the first album his voice was a soft, romantic, Chris De Burgh-ish style. This time his voice is more like Greg Keelor of Blue Rodeo which seems to better fit the new country-pop style of Now. "Yeah, I guess we went the Eagles, James Brown, Blue Rodeo route," he says.

Now is a collection of 14 strong, hummable country-pop crossover songs like Steel Blue Dress and Love Will Find You Again, and some milder, mostly harmless ballads like Wild One and Will I Ever See You Again. Samuels wrote, sings and plays the piano on all of the songs.

His strong voice and multi-talented band including Kim Mitchells and Katrina and the Waves alumni blend well-together. Most of the songs are very radio-accessible particularly the rocky Talk About Love and his upcoming single Wild One.

Most of Samuels lyrics tend to have one theme — love. "Most of my songs are from personal experiences in my life though not necessarily ones that I've lived through."

He said he's a close observer of people and writes songs based on stories other people might tell him. "I like to write songs people can relate to. That's what the songs I listened to did to me."

Samuels musical influences are Billy Joel, Elton John, James Taylor Bonni Raitt and Bruce Hornsby. However he's also been influenced by the Latino sounds of Sade. Missing You from his debut single has a close Smooth Operator feel to it. "I'll have a feeling I'll be doing a lot more of them [Sade-inspired songs]. It kind of comes naturally to me. Israeli music is also similar, it has the same minor chord changes."

Samuels is a very versatile songwriter. The last track on Now, and totally out of synch with any other song on the album, is Have You Ever Loved A Woman, a bluesy bar song. A wonderful surprise.

In May 1995, Samuels joined a group of 23 children in singing Sharing A Dream, a song he co-wrote for the launch of the fundraising dinner for the Jerusalem Foundation in Toronto. "It was an honor for me. Vivien Shapiro wrote the lyrics and I wrote the music. It was a song about Israeli kids of all religions and cultures and it was very inspiring to write that song. We performed the song with the children's choir and it was very magical and very powerful."

Back in his early days performing in piano bars in Israel, Samuels was approached by a booking agent to play a 40-minute set as an opening act for pop superstar Tina Turner. "The opening act cancelled and I was asked to do it. I didn't have a lot of original stuff so I sang two of my songs and did covers. They were very well received and it gave me a lot of confidence to perform and make records." Also encouraging was winning the 1987 Gordon Lightfoot Songwriters Scholarship by the Canadian Music Publishers Association.

Samuels is ready to go on the road with his band but is waiting to get on the right bill with a major act. In the meantime, he'll be appearing at the video release party for Wild One May 12 at Hemispheres in the Metropolitan Hotel, one of his major sponsors.

Touring Israeli teenagers strike the right chord

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — With the exception of a few isolated giggles from jet-lagged members of Israel's Moran Choir, the teenage ensemble's performance last week at Beth Habonim Congregation seemed to strike all the right chords.

Forty singers, all between the ages of 12 and 19, charmed the capacity crowd, a mix of English- and Hebrew-speakers, with their talent and personality.

A girls' choir based in Moshav Beit Yitzhak near Netanya, the Moran Choir kicked off its 1997 North American tour here before leaving to perform in Montreal and five American cities.

Neshema Carlebach made a special guest appearance, following in the footsteps of her late father Shlomo with her soulful singing and telling of mystical tales.

The event was sponsored by the Beth Habonim, Canada-Israel Experience Centre; March of the Living; Young Leadership Cabinet, UJA Federation; and United Israel Appeal of Canada (UIA); in co-operation with the Consulate General of Israel. Les Aaron, co-chair of UJA's young leadership cabinet, emceed the evening. Eli Rubenstein, spiritual leader of Beth Habonim, and director of young leadership of UIA Canada also spoke.

The professional calibre choir is directed by Naomi Faran, who has taught advanced master classes in conducting and was awarded the Outstanding Conductor prize at an international choir competition held in Israel last year.

The group performs 30 times a year, singing regularly with the Israeli Philharmonic Orchestra, the Israeli Chamber Orchestra and the New Israeli Opera.

Accompanied by award-winning pianist Saar Ahuvia, the singers demonstrated musical and linguistic versatility in a program that ranged from Israeli children's songs to French opera (The Street Children from Carmen) to a bouncy Russian "nonsense song," a Yiddish ballad and the somewhat incongruous (for a synagogue venue) Christmas carols by Benjamin Britten.

Eye on Arts

by Bill Gladstone

FAMILY FINDS PAINTING LOOTED BY NAZIS

Members of a Chicago Jewish family have located an impressionist painting they claim was stolen half a century ago from their grandfather, Freidrich Gutmann, a wealthy Dutch banker who was killed in a concentration camp.

The painting, Landscape with Smokestacks, was painted by Edgar Degas in 1890. Ten years ago, philanthropist Daniel Searle acquired the work from collector Emile Wolfe for $850,000. Now brothers Nick and Simon Goodman, and their aunt Lili Gutmann, have launched a lawsuit to reclaim the painting.

Searle, former head of G.D. Searles and Co. and a trustee of the Art Institute of Chicago, has acknowledged through his attorney that the painting did belong to Freidrich Gutmann "sometime in the 1930s," according to a report by the Jewish Telegraphic Agency.

Searle's lawyer asserts that Searle did not know the painting had been stolen when he acquired it in 1987, and that a statute of limitations concerning the Goodmans' claim has expired. But the Goodmans' lawyer counters that the family made extraordinary and diligent efforts to find the painting "over a lengthy period of time in the face of very significant obstacles" and they are not about to relinquish their right to it.

The Art Newspaper describes the case as "the most significant World War II art restitution case ever to reach a U.S. court." The court date is set for Nov. 3.

Film Notes

• Running May 1 to 8, the fifth annual Toronto Jewish Film Festival has released its program. The fest opens with a 1996 Israeli-Italian co-production, The Italians Are Coming, a "charming, sweet comedy" that touches on everything from "the declining interest in kibbutz life among Israelis to stereotypical perceptions of Israelis and Italians." That's just the first of a full roster of films. To purchase tickets or attain a program, phone 416-324-8600, fax 416-324-8668, or e-mail [tjff@interlong.com]. The festival Web site is at [www.web-sights.com/tjff].

• The Un-Canadians, a new film and video that recently made its premiere, focuses on the victimization of Canadians who hold anti-Establishment views in the post-McCarthy era. Winchevsky Centre, April 18, 8 p.m. Admission free but donations welcomed. 585 Cranbrooke Ave. 416-789-5502.

• California-based veteran filmmaker Saul Zaentz, a New Jersey native, recently picked up an Academy Award for producing The English Patient, voted best picture of the year at the 69th annual awards. It's Zaentz's third Oscar in as many decades. Previous wins were for One Flew Over The Cuckoo's Nest in 1975 and Amadeus in 1984.

Music & Dance

• AshkeTANTS, a special Yiddish dance party to celebrate spring, features the likes of the Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band, comedienne Deb Filler, Yiddish singer- actor Beth Anne Cole, Yiddishist Michael Wex and dancer-choreographer Shula Saltzman. Bloor JCC, April 26, doors open at 8 p.m. Tickets $10. Hosted by Ashkenaz. 416-924-5711.

• The Russian Dance & Music Company presents a Gala Variety Show featuring energetic and colorful Russian dancing, Viennese, Gypsy and classical music, a circus high rope act, plus a tribute in dance and song to North American jazz and ragtime music. May 14 and 15, 2 p.m., and May 31, 7:30 p.m. Leah Posluns Theatre. Adults $20. 416-224-1296.

• OMO Dance Co. premieres three new works by Debbie Wilson —Abendstanze, Third Swan From the Left and Song of Solomon. Winchester Theatre, 80 Winchester St., east of Parliament. Adults $15. April 18 to 20, 8 p.m. 416-979-8209.

• Two Peas In A Pod Productions presents A Night of Jewish Women's Talent involving dancing, singing, "awesome music and poetry in motion." A benefit for LIFE. April 17, 7:30 p.m. The Silver Dollar. $8 (sliding scale).

• Toronto Senior Strings performs a program of Vivaldi, Mozart, Pachelbel, Prokofiev and other classics at St. Andrew's Presbyterian church, King at Simcoe St., April 17, 2 p.m. Tickets $10 at the door. 416-769-5071.

• United Congregational Schools presents Fran Avni in Mostly Matzah: A Passover Concert For Families, Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, April 27, 10 to 12 noon. For tickets (adults $10) call school office 416-633-1338, synagogue office 633-3838 or Beth David 633-5500. All proceeds to United Congregational Schools.

Touring Israeli teenage choir strike the right musical chord sung in English and Hebrew, as well as an expertly executed operatic German version of Mozart's Riddle of the Flowers, which prompted one enthusiastic audience member to call out, "Bravo!"

Along with Lay Down Your Arms, one of the evening's most poignant numbers was Song of Peace, written for the choir on the occasion of the Israel-Jordan peace treaty signing, when they performed the song on Israel Television.

The lyrics, translated into English, read, in part: "Welcome to you peace. We don't really know you, only what we've heard in stories and in songs...

"Forgive us if we are still careful, but don't forget, we are still strangers to each other... You will see that soon we will be friends."

A Canada-Israel link of friendship was extended when Ben Prossin, executive director of the Jewish National Fund (JNF), presented a JNF certificate to choir member Natali Geva, whose Canadian-born mother was a friend of his in university.

Prossin told of a link between the two countries going back to 1927, when then JNF president Menahem Ussishkin visited Canada on a fundraising tour that yielded donations of over $300,000 toward purchase of the Hefer Valley area of Israel, where Moshav Beit Yitzhak is now located.

Coming of age on a Tunis beach

BY BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

There is a dreamy, almost fairy-tale aspect to A Summer In La Goulette, the nostalgic comic-drama by Tunisian director Ferid Boughedir that opens April 18 at Toronto's Carlton Cinemas.

La Goulette is a lush, sun-bathed Tunisian harbor and resort town near Tunis where Muslims, Christians and Jews live together in friendship and harmony. At least they do at the beginning of the film.

In Boughedir's sensual allegory, three families of different faiths live together in an apartment building owned by the wealthy Arab Double Hadj. The fathers are inseparable friends and so are their three 16-year-old daughters — Meriem, Gigi and Tina — who are eager to burst from sexual innocence to experience.

Each of them vows to lose her virginity to a boy of a different religion by the end of the summer, but their fathers find out and explode.

This North African variant of A Midsummer Night's Dream has a darkly disturbing undercurrent, as though Boughedir wants to show us how easily paradise falls apart at the seams. The crusty old landlord, Double Hadj, whose name suggests he's a devoted and pious Muslim, begins to lust after Meriem, whom he has accidentally glimpsed undressed. When trouble erupts among his tenants, he threatens to evict them, but he's actually most interested in getting his hands on the girl.

Boughedir excels at colorful cameos, such as the character — a sort of village idiot — who keeps his ears glued to the radio, listening for news of the war that has been imminent in the region. As we eventually learn, the year is 1967.

It's important to understand that the Arab-Israeli Six Day War that erupted in June of 1967 exacerbated inter-ethnic tensions in the Arab world to the point that Jewish families, particularly in the Maghreb, were forced to uproot themselves and flee. With the outbreak of war, the sunny idyllic life of La Goulette instantly vanished under the dark political clouds that had been threatening all along.

Boughedir gets good and credible performances from his cast, some of whom (particularly the youngsters) had not acted before.

However, there is a lightweight, disjointed quality to this Paradise Lost, which is perhaps why Variety called it "an entertaining trifle with an affectingly bittersweet edge."

La Goulette is a lush resort town near Tunis.

Maccabi tennis team a mix of 'youth, experience'

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The 41 budding tennis stars hailed from across Canada.

But when the last ball was volleyed and the final serve aced after 66 matches, 12 players from Quebec, Ontario, Manitoba and British Columbia and two alternates proved good enough to qualify for Maccabi Canada's tennis team at the recent national trials in Montreal.

"It's a good mix of youth and experience," said Norman Katz, the tennis team coach who will accompany the squad to Israel July 9 to 24 for the 15th Maccabiah Games. "I'm excited about it."

Katz, who at 32 will be attending his first Maccabiah Games, felt he had good reason to feel pretty optimistic about the prospects for a Canadian tennis medal, which has so far eluded Canada.

"Tennis is one of the most popular and competitive sports at the games. Virtually all of the 50 countries coming to the Maccabiah will field tennis teams. They will play at the Israel Tennis Centre in Ramat Hasharon, about 15 minutes outside Tel Aviv. (Medal matches will be played on the centre's "Canada Court.")

Canadian players will have their work cut out for them, since they'll have to outserve and volley top-ranked players from Israel and the United States, which traditionally field the strongest teams (past U.S Maccabiah tennis veterans have included players like Brad Gilbert, a former top pro).

But Katz feels a tennis medal in '97 falls within the realm of possibility.

The team, which will compete in Men's and Women's "open" and Boy's and Girl's "junior" singles, doubles and mixed doubles play, includes Montreal's David Abelson, whom Katz described as a "class player" and Canada's best medal bet.

Abelson goes to Miami University in Ohio and is ranked as an NCAA "division 1" player, which is in line with a "pro" ranking, Katz said.

The two best female players, Katz's believes, are sisters Shiera and Yael Stuart of Richmond, B.C.

Both are Maccabiah veterans, as is Charles Wright, of London, Ont., who at 29 will be the oldest player on the team.

These young tennis players were all smiles after they qualified recently for Maccabi Canada's tennis team at the Rockland Sport Tennis Club.

Other team members include Ben Zigglestein of Toronto and Dr. Chaim Edelstein of Montreal (Men's Open category); Tracey Winter of Montreal and Kelly Kives of Winnipeg (Women's Open category); Jeremy Perez and Julien Wolfson of Montreal (Junior Boy's category); and Helena Vander of Toronto and Cassianne Robinson-Cohen of Montreal (Junior Girls' category).

Two other players, Daniel Kives of Winnipeg and Jordan Bohnen of Toronto, will also likely be going to Israel as "quasi-alternates," Katz said.

With only seven months to go before the Maccabiah, Katz, the full-time pro at Rockland Sport Tennis Club for the last eight years (where the trials took place) and involved with the Maccabi Youth Games for the last nine, has his work cut out for him.

Besides having to institute a training regimen that will have to be conducted largely by phone and fax (for the non-Montrealers), the team will be seeking to raise about $5,000 per athlete to pay for their trips to Israel.

At the national trials, which were sanctioned by the Fédération québecoise de tennis and included the participation of the team's assistant coach, Jackie Feffer, trials director Brian Wexler and Leon Elfassy, sponsors proved easy to come by.

Rockland Sport, for its part, donated $2,000 worth of court time, while corporate sponsors Wilson Sport supplied the tennis balls and Gatorade provided the refreshments.

Winnipeg student wins Canadian judo champs

By MYRON LOVE
Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Aaron Pfeffer, a Grade 9 student at Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate, Winnipeg's Jewish high school, is the Canadian Juvenile Judo Champion for 1997. Pfeffer won the title at a recent, two-day competition in Halifax.

He has been doing judo since he was seven after becoming interested through an older brother's friend. He has won the Manitoba provincial championship in his age category for the past three years and won a bronze last year at the national championships in Calgary.

The tournament is a modified round robin affair, he says. The contestant is eliminated after two losses. If you lose once, the highest you can go is bronze.

Pfeffer has one more year in the Juvenile category. Now, as Canadian champ, he's looking forward to international competitions.

Eventually, he's hoping to compete in the Olympics.

The Inside Back

The new Haggadot

By JORDAN MAX
Special to The CJN

Here is a sample of this year's new Haggadot which I have recently previewed, soon to be available at a bookstore near you.

The Common Sense Mega Haggadah. A revolutionary, re-interpreted and downsized Haggadah containing 22 percent fewer characters. Recasts Egyptians as modern day multi-tiered governments piling up crushing debt on poor taxpaying Jews and the story of how a single tax-fighting leader led them through a revolution to the promised land of fiscal Responsibility, Prosperity and a Tax Cut. Interesting section on the Ten Plagues of Debt and the efficiency of splitting the Waters of the Reed Sea 50/50. Explains the significance of the Omnibus Revelation Amalgamation of the Tribes at Har Sinai. A little short on details, some inconsistencies, however, its pamphlet format travels well, from boardroom to seder table to golf course. Likely to appeal mostly to neo-conservatives and special groups, but its simple answers makes it comprehensible for all ages.

Little Yasser's Jihadaggah. This soon-to-be-classic for children is based on new research which proves categorically that it was actually the Palestinian people who were enslaved in Egypt by the rich and powerful Jews, liberated from Egypt, given the Torah and led through the desert to Eretz Yisrael, with Jerusalem as its capital, before being wrongfully evicted by the Romans for merely falling behind on their property taxes. Recommended by the UN as "a bold and brilliant re-discovery of history." Some political overtones. For parents who want a more "balanced" presentation of Middle East history.

The Martha Stewart Haggadah. A really tastefully decorated Haggadah, stressing the paramount importance of food, proper decor and mood lighting to your seder. Includes how-to sections on early Israelite planters, table centrepieces and party favors, etiquette on whole roast lamb presentation, and cleaning tips for getting blood off doorposts. Tends to ignore most of story line and concentrates mostly on the Shulchan Aruch (meal) and table setting, and their importance to Jewish culture and society today. A perfect gift for someone with all the time in the world planning an intimate 150-guest seder.

The National Midnight Sun Haggadah. Interesting concept of the story of the Exodus as portrayed through tabloid-style articles and real, uncensored pictures. Many sidebars on the relevant Exodus personalities. Includes Moses' murder trial, Was Pharaoh an Alien? the all-Manna Diet, Miriam's Miracle Cure, Eliyahu sightings and much more. Appeals most to those who get their hard news at the supermarket checkout line and soap opera fans.

The Virtual Reality Haggadah. This version is actually a special headset to be worn by the "reader." Allows you to sit with your family at the seder without actually sitting with your family at the seder, or to reprogram for another family, movie stars, Blue Jays, Raptors, Elvis. Experience hard physical labor in Egypt. See Pharaoh's chariots charging after you. Feel the crunch as you bite into that first bit of matzah. Actually taste the maror and Bubbie's chicken soup. Relive (or alter) all your memorable seders with this technological innovation. Still a few bugs to work out, as all food at the seder still tastes like matzah. Appeals to techies and people who wish they had different families.

With these new versions, you are guaranteed that no one at your seders will have an excuse for asking the forbidding fifth question "When do we eat?" Chag Samayach!

CHOCOLATE MATZO TORTE

WE SELL KitchenAid FOR LESS

Torte:	Filling:		Chocolate Frosting:
8 matzohs	1 cup sugar	1 cup boiling water	6 oz. chocolate chips
sweet red wine	3 tblsp. potato starch	2 tblsp. margarine	2 tblsp. margarine
	1/8 tsp. salt	1 cup chocolate chips	2 tblsp. water
		1 tsp. vanilla	chopped nuts

Filling: Cook sugar, starch, salt and boiling water stirring constantly until boiling for 1 minute. Remove from heat. Stir in chips until smooth, then margarine and vanilla. Spread while warm.

Dip a matzo in wine on both sides, and place on serving dish. Spread with filling. Repeat layers, ending with matzo. Melt chips with margarine and water. Frost sides and top of torte. Decorate with chopped nuts, chill.

About Life

Dear Ella,

Although I don't keep kosher throughout the year, and I'm not shomer Shabbat, I have always been a stickler for kashrut on Passover. Making our home kosher for Passover was something we always did together as a family and it is one of the religious things that I continue to observe in my own life.

Eric, my boyfriend, wants me to go to his house for a seder this year. This is the first Passover we will be spending together. His family are traditional Jews, but they don't observe many of the basic kashrut laws for Passover. They claim there is no chametz in their home, but just the fact that dinner is served on their "good dishes" that have been used all year is not acceptable to me.

Eric calls me a hypocrite and says I'm just using "this chametz thing" as an excuse to spend both seders with my family. How can I make him understand?

Kosher Clashes.

Dear Kosher Clashes,

Religion is a very personal and spiritual thing. It not only signifies a bond with G-d, but in your case, it also brings back what sounds like a happy and comforting experience that you were able to share together with your family. Your parents have instilled the importance of Pesach in you, and you must now try to explain it to Eric.

Tell him in detail of the way you kashered your home. Explain the hard work of changing everything over, all the cleaning, all the cooking, all the fussing to make sure that everything was just right. Then the feeling of sitting down to the seder with your family, the togetherness, the bonding, the fun and the importance of knowing why this holiday is different from all other holidays. If you can explain to Eric how special Passover is to you, it may just become special to him too.

I would also like to thank everyone who sent in those long lost recipes of the past and helped "Food for Thought" and myself. You have helped to make her Pesach a little more special this year. The recipe is above in the Herb Caplan ad.

Coalition faces new hurdles

By DAVID LANDAU
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Although Israel's attorney general has announced his conclusions in the Bar-On affair, the ramifications of the investigation into influence-peddling in the Netanyahu government are not yet over.

Analysis

While Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu eluded indictment in the affair, he has been continuing to maintain his political stature even as he sought to reassure his coalition partners.

Attorney General Elyakim Rubinstein announced last Sunday that he had not found sufficient evidence in a 995-page police report to indict Netanyahu in connection with corruption allegations surrounding the short-lived appointment of Roni Bar-On as attorney general.

Citing a similar lack of evidence, Rubinstein said the file on Justice Minister Tzachi Hanegbi also would be closed.

The attorney general did find grounds to indict Aryeh Deri, Shas leader in the Knesset, for alleged breach of trust, fraud and extortion.

Speaking at a news conference where he and State Attorney Edna Arbel announced their decision, Rubinstein said that a "dismal picture" of the norms of government had emerged from the police investigation, but that insufficient evidence of criminal behavior was found.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu gives the "thumbs-up" sign before his speech to the Likud last week.
[Reuter/RNS photo]

The police had recommended bringing charges against Netanyahu, Hanegbi and Avigdor Lieberman, director-general of the Premier's Office, but the final decision was in the hands of Arbel and Rubinstein. They have not yet made a decision about Lieberman.

"We based our decision on purely professional elements: Is there enough evidence to file criminal charges?" Rubinstein said.

Netanyahu welcomed the attorney general's decision, saying he felt vindicated.

"I made a mistake, I admit that, but I did not commit a crime. There is a big difference between the two," he said in a televised statement.

The attorney general's announcement followed intensive consultations on the findings of a three-month long police probe into allegations surrounding the aborted appointment in January of Bar-On, a Jerusalem lawyer and Likud activist.

Bar-On, whose appointment was endorsed at a Jan. 10 cabinet meeting, stepped down two days later amid a controversy over his professional qualifications.

Israel mourns Chaim Herzog

By GREER FAY CASHMAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — In the grand hall of Beit Hanassi where for 10 years she had greeted so many people at presidential receptions, Aura Herzog received the condolences of the nation on the death of her husband, Israel's sixth president, Chaim Herzog.

At her side were her children, Joel, Michael, Isaac and Ronit, and other relatives.

Representatives from the former president's many areas of activity were among the hundreds of people from all over the country who came to pay their last respects to the man whom his successor, Ezer Weizman, described as "the personification of the Zionist movement."

Aura Herzog said she was amazed by the flood of messages she had received from monarchs, heads of state and government leaders from all over the world since her husband's death last week.

With his passing, Herzog changed the balance of the most exclusive fraternity in Israel, the Presidents' Club. Prior to his death, it had a membership of four of Israel's seven presidents. Now there are three: Ephraim Katzir, Yitzhak Navon and Ezer Weizman.

Please see pages 8 and 9

Among the people who for over four hours filed through Beit Hanassi where Herzog's flag-draped coffin lay in state were Judge Israel Feinstein and his wife, Marion, whose wedding Herzog had attended in London 50 years ago. Herzog and his wife would have celebrated their own 50th wedding anniversary in three weeks.

Many of the visitors wrote inscriptions in a book of remembrance alongside which were a black-ribboned photograph of Herzog, a memorial candle and his military decorations.

At one stage, the area of the room in which Aura Herzog was seated, appeared to represent the human saga of the creation and development of the state.

Alongside her were Ezer and Reuma Weizman, her brother-in-law Abba Eban and Teddy Kollek.

The sight prompted British Ambassador David Manning to remark that Herzog himself had been "a living link with the past."

Nissan Limor, who had been director-general of Beit Hanassi for the whole of Herzog's tenure, and Ami Gluska, who had been his military adjutant for five years, both said his visit to Bergen-Belsen was the most memorable and emotional event of his term.

Herzog was the first Israeli president to set foot in Germany, Gluska recalled. As a member of Montgomery's forces, Herzog had been among the liberators of Bergen-Belsen and for him the controversial visit was the closing of a circle. But he had made it very clear that neither Israel nor the Jewish people would forgive or forget.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Jewish Unity Welcomed

OTTAWA — Canadian Jewish Congress has welcomed the consensus expressed by representatives of all branches of Judaism, criticizing the recent divisive pronouncement of the Union of Orthodox Rabbis in the United States.

Okanagan News

KELOWNA — The Okanagan Jewish Community recently held an International Day for the Elimination of Racism arranged by the Kelowna Multicultural Society.

ISRAEL

Burial Controversy

JERUSALEM — Israel's chief rabbis and Ministry of Absorption have agreed on a way to resolve the controversy over burials for some immigrants from the former Soviet Union. Many of the immigrants are not considered Jewish by the Orthodox rabbinate and burial societies.

The agreement allows those Israelis whose Jewishness is in question to be buried in separate sections of existing Jewish cemeteries.

Bedouin Students

JERUSALEM — Twenty-six 12th graders recently received diplomas from Ben-Gurion University (BGU) of the Negev for successfully completing a two-year course of enrichment in medical sciences. Two of the graduates – both girls – will be applying to BGU's Joyce and Irving Goldman Medical School.

That is a major milestone, for there is not a single Bedouin female physician in Israel, nor is there a female Bedouin nurse in the Negev.

WORLD

Rabbi Sentenced

SANTA ROSA, Calif. — Rabbi Sidney Isaac Goldenberg was sentenced recently to three years in state prison for sexually molesting a 12-year-old student during private bat mitzvah tutoring sessions.

Judge Mark Tansil of the Superior Court here issued the sentence after an emotional hearing, during which the victim and her family called for a harsh sentence while Rabbi Goldenberg asked for leniency.

Citizenship Lost

NEW YORK — An Illinois man who took part in a World War II massacre of Jews and who served at Treblinka has been stripped of his American citizenship, the U.S. Justice Department announced.

District Judge David Coar in Chicago ruled late last week that Bronislaw Hajda was ineligible for citizenship because he concealed his wartime activities from U.S. officials when he applied to immigrate in 1950 and when he applied to become a citizen in 1955.

New Russian Envoy

MOSCOW — Russia will soon be sending a new ambassador to Israel.

Alexander Bovin, who has served more than five years as ambassador said he would be replaced in mid-May. Bovin was Russia's first ambassador to Israel since the two countries broke off diplomatic relations in 1967.

Search For Lost Gold

BRASILIA — Brazilian President Fernando Henrique Cardoso has signed a decree creating a special commission to trace gold and other assets stolen from Holocaust victims and believed to have been smuggled into the country by Nazis after World War II.

The commission will also attempt to determine whether any former Nazis, many of whom found a safe haven in South America after the war, are still living in Brazil.

Accord Approved

STRASBOURG — The European parliament has approved a trade and cooperation accord between the European Union and the Palestinian Authority.

While the agreement covers economic issues, diplomatic sources say its true significance is political, because it reflects the European Union's desire for closer ties with the Palestinian Authority.

Priebke on Trial Again

ROME — Former Nazi SS Capt. Erich Priebke went on trial last week to face for a second time war crimes charges related to Italy's worst World War II atrocity.

The retrial opened when the military court ruled that another ex-Nazi, former SS Maj. Karl Hass, would be tried jointly with the 83-year-old Priebke on similar charges.

Both face charges in the March 1944 mass execution of 335 men and boys in the Ardeatine Caves south of Rome.

Arrests in Frankfurt

BONN — Two people were arrested last week in Frankfurt after scuffles outside the opening of an exhibition on the crimes of Hitler's army.

The exhibit, which shows the involvement of the German army in the mass killing of Jews during World War II, has been shown in dozens of towns across Germany since it was launched two years ago.

ISRAEL SETS OUT WEST BANK PROPOSALS

Israeli leaders, responding to King Hussein's plan for a federal Jordan, are at long last beginning to come forward with tentative counter proposals in regard to the political future of the West Bank.

The government has avoided adopting a clear public stand on this issue in order to avoid a split in its own ranks, for while most Labor party leaders believe the disposition of the West Bank is negotiable, most of their coalition colleagues in the National Religious Party hold that the West Bank, as part of the historic land of Israel, cannot be abandoned under any circumstances.

STAND PAT BUDGET FEARED

Stringent provincial and municipal budgeting this year could seriously affect Jewish child care programs in Metropolitan Toronto.

Although Toronto's Jewish Family and Child Service director Jerome Diamond was cautious about becoming excessively pessimistic or making positive predictions, he expressed concern that child care workers will face enormous difficulties coping with the community's rising demand for assistance.

A steadily increasing child care case load may signal a stop to program expansion this fall, or, even service cutbacks.

Harris Tories come under fire for cutting anti-racism program

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jewish organizations are calling on Ontario's cost-cutting Tories to reverse their axing of a highly-regarded government anti-racism program.

Both Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), Ontario region, and the League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith Canada (BBC) say the scrapping of the anti-racism branch of the Education Ministry was a mistake that will make it easier for hate groups to recruit at schools.

The ministry's Anti-Discrimination and Equal Opportunities branch, set up by the previous NDP government in 1993, wound up operations April 11. According to branch director Nora Allingham, two of its 10 employees have been declared surplus, including Allingham, and the remaining eight will be assigned to other ministry positions.

The branch was responsible for helping school boards develop and implement anti-racism programs, and to help schools fend off the aggressive recruitment tactics of groups like the neo-Nazi Heritage Front.

"We've lost an important tool in the fight against racism," remarked CJC's Steve Shulman, "and it's not clear how the gap will be closed."

Shulman said the program was the "primary" way to fight the spread of racism at Ontario schools, where hate groups can encounter fertile ground for new recruits. "We believe that one of the main reasons the increase in [campus] racist groups was curbed was because of this program. The result was that racist groups were barred from schools and students weren't reeled in."

CJC, he said, is calling on the government to reinstate the program. "Not all government programs are successful," he said. "This one was."

Karen Mock of the League for Human Rights said the scrapping of the program is "unconscionable."

She particularly slammed the Tories for failing to deliver to educators a guidebook on how to confront racist groups on campus.

"It was ready to go and they sat on it. Now, it will never see the light of day," Mock said.

She said the League, which worked hard to ensure the unit was created, "will do whatever we can to make sure these initiatives continue."

No one from the Education Ministry was available for comment.

Last-ditch appeal made to save Branson

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A last-ditch rescue effort is underway to help keep open the doors of Branson Hospital, a facility that is important to the health of the Jewish community.

The area served by the hospital has many elderly residents at risk for heart attacks, who count on the emergency department.

Branson is to close before the end of 1999, according to an order of the Health Services Restructuring Commission (HSRC), which also ordered the closing of 10 other Metro hospitals.

Last-minute appeals are being made to save Branson, which admitted more than 400 heart attack victims in 1994-95.

The effort is being spearheaded by two leading Jewish organizations, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and the Ontario region of Canadian Jewish Congress.

They have sent copies of their appeal to Premier Mike Harris, Minister of Health Jim Wilson and Attorney General Charles Harnick. Harnick, who represents an adjoining riding, has already replied that he is ready and anxious to meet on the issue. They are also asking that residents write to Harris and their MPPs to express their concern.

An unexpected ally in their cause is the Metro Toronto District Health Council (MTDHC), which has sent its own appeal to the commission to keep Branson open as an ambulatory care centre (emergency and outpatient services).

The council originally recommended that Branson's acute care beds be closed, but that it remain open for ambulatory care.

Significantly, this would keep one-third to one-half of Branson's facilities operating in the present building, according to Lorne Zon, the council's executive director. This would include doctors trained in emergency services.

Branson serves the largest Jewish patient caseload of any Metro hospital, states a letter to the commission from UJA Federation and Congress.

They estimate that one-third of Branson's inpatients are Jews, as well as 50 percent of those treated in emergency or outpatients clinics.

Another major point in the appeal is that as the only Seventh Day Adventist hospital in Canada, Branson has developed a lot of special ritual and religious services for the Jewish community.

Also, closing Branson completely will seriously affect the many Jewish physicians on its staff who will have no place to admit their patients. If doctors leave the community because of this economic pressure, then the medical needs of the area's population will not be met.

The appeal zeroes in on the fact that 25,000 elderly persons, 10,000 of them Jews, live in the immediate vicinity of Branson, and that an even larger number reside in the hospital's larger catchment area.

Keeping an ambulatory care centre open at Queensway General Hospital for senior citizens, while shutting down Branson, even though it serves more seniors than Queensway, is discriminatory, the federation and Congress state.

"Branson provides almost twice as many ambulatory care (i.e. outpatient) services as does the Queensway Hospital," their appeal says. "Comparing the combined emergency and outpatient departments of Queensway with that of Branson, it is clear, based on the HSRC's own statistics, that Branson provides many more medical services. The HSRC, inequitably and discriminatorily, has determined that the people in the Queensway catchment area are in need of greater provision of health care services than are those in the Branson catchment area."

In view of the community's needs, closing Branson is "unconscionable" states the appeal signed by Harold Brief, vice-chair of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, and Alan Sandler vice-president, community planning and allocations, UJA Federation.

Among Branson' services which are uniquely welcomed by the Jewish community, their letter lists the following: The hospital is one of only two in Metro with an on-site Jewish chapel; Jewish holiday and ritual services are provided on-site for people in the hospital community; it provides kosher meals and respects Sabbath observances; it is accessible by foot so that Sabbath visits by observant Jewish patients, their relatives and physicians are possible; it provides sleep rooms for Jewish physicians on-call during the Sabbath; it allows for the ritual needs of deceased Jewish patients and is sensitive to Jewish beliefs on autopsy and burial of limbs.

The appeal states that the concern for the elderly is acknowledged by the MTDHC report, which noted that the elderly in the Branson catchment area are among the highest users of health care services and have the most difficulty when it come to access. Furthermore, many of these people are recent immigrants with few English language skills and little access to private transportation.

The Jewish community would have to utilize the facilities of the North York General Hospital, the York-Finch Hospital or York Central Hospital. For elderly patients using public transit, this could mean more than one bus transfer and a long commute.

Concern is expressed about the rights of the medical staff at Branson. "A significant percentage of those physicians are members of the Jewish community. We are concerned that failure to make it mandatory that the surviving public hospitals provide each of them with the active staff and admitting privileges could well result in the loss of their ability to practise their profession."

The commission planned to hear appeals about Branson's future until April 18, but has set no date on when it will respond. There is no appeal from its final decision.

Clarification

The article "C-IC seeks meet with Axworthy over Hezbollah," [CJN, April 17] stated that the Canada-Israel Committee is seeking a meeting with Foreign Affairs Minister Lloyd Axworthy to discuss reports that Hezbollah has a network in Canada. However, according to the C-IC, the main purpose of the meeting is to discuss Canadian foreign policy and how it will be applied to the Middle East peace process.

CORRECTION

In the recipe for Chocolate marshmallow surprise (CJN, April 10), an e-mail gremlin left out part of the instructions.

The second sentence of the directions should read: In a saucepan, melt butter and chocolate over low heat.

In the same article, the ingredients for Lyonnaise hot potato salad are correct. Use your own judgment in how many potatoes to use. A good estimate is about one medium-size potato per serving.

Congregation divided over rabbi's contract

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A special membership meeting attended by an estimated 500 people was held last week at Beth Sholom Synagogue in a bid by some members for the reversal of a decision made by its board of governors not to renew Rabbi Irvin Brandwein's contract.

His contract has not been renewed, confirmed Ruth Podeswa, executive director of the Eglinton Avenue Conservative congregation, following the meeting, but she had no comment on whether the rabbi would complete the remainder of his term, which expires at the end of July.

About 140 supporters of Rabbi Brandwein had signed a petition requesting the meeting, which was then convened as required under the synagogue's constitution. Beth Sholom has 3,000 members, according to the rabbi.

The 44-year-old rabbi was hired in the summer of 1992, following a six-year stint at Temple Beth Emeth in Anaheim, Calif. An alumnus of the Jewish Theological Seminary, where he received smichah in 1981, Rabbi Brandwein has also held pulpits in two other American cities.

He is a member in good standing of the Rabbinical Assembly, according to Rabbi Elliot Schoenberg, associate executive director of the Conservative rabbis' umbrella association.

Synagogue president Alan Zelunka and immediate past president Norman Talsky refused to comment when contacted by The CJN. However, a March 31 letter to which they were signatories was critical of the rabbi's job performance. The letter was sent to congregants urging them to attend the April 15 meeting.

In an unusual move, seven congregational past presidents signed a letter supporting the board of governors. That letter was also dated March 31 and sent to members.

The following day, a second letter was sent to members urging them to attend the meeting. This one, signed by Garth Drabinsky, chief executive officer of Livent and Albert Latner, chairman and CEO, Dynacare Health Group Inc., spoke of the rabbi's "care, inspiration and guidance.

"We have come to recognize that he is the right person... Let us do what is just and maintain the Rabbi's continuing association with Beth Sholom," they wrote.

Although job performance was the ostensible issue, Rabbi Brandwein said in a speech at the meeting that in the past year he has "been forced to cope with many ugly rumors which have circulated about my professional and personal life."

"They kicked him when he was down, as far as I can see," said Lynda Friendly, executive vice-president of Livent Inc., one of the congregants who signed the petition calling for the meeting in response to the board of governors' decision not to renew the rabbi's contract.

In the past two and a half years, Rabbi Brandwein's mother died, his marriage fell apart and he was involved in a custody battle over his young son.

"There was very little compassion shown to him," said Friendly. When her father died in January, she added, the rabbi "showed his leadership, his strength. He was there for us. His wisdom, his availability and his nurturing way were so important to my family."

Friendly was distressed over the apparent "atmosphere of intimidation" at the recent meeting. "People were clapping if there was a negative thing said about the rabbi. Whenever a positive comment was made, there was at the very least snickering and [sometimes] profanity. For the most part, the positive supporters were shouted down. People who were his supporters were afraid to speak."

Zelunka, "to his credit, tried to do the best job he could under the circumstances," Friendly said. The results of the vote were "pretty decisive, [although] the actual numbers were confidential," she added.

She thought the voting process itself was poorly conducted, but had no criticism for the tabulation, which was conducted in the presence of some of the rabbi's supporters, she said.

"It's clear the membership wants a new rabbi. I accept that... It doesn't mean I'm going to leave the synagogue. It's a wait-and-see situation."

"I feel a deep sense of relief that this is all over," said Rabbi Brandwein.

History book marks JIAS' 75th anniversary

TORONTO — This year marks the 75th anniversary of Jewish Immigrant Aid Services of Canada (JIAS). As a special project, JIAS Toronto is commemorating the history of the Greater Toronto Jewish community by producing a JIAS 75th anniversary Community Heritage Book.

This archival, pictorial edition will document the family, organized and corporate histories of a broad cross-section of Toronto's Jewish community.

"The Community Heritage Book will be a treasured compendium of family histories, a tribute to our communal accomplishments and an expression of gratitude to Canada for the freedoms we enjoy here," said Genya Intrator, honorary chair of the 75th anniversary committee.

Since its inception, JIAS has brought over 200,000 Jews to Canada from all parts of the world, assisting them with food, clothing, shelter and retraining. Most came with no English, few skills, and often just the clothes on their backs.

"Virtually every Jewish family has, at some point in their history, been touched by immigration," said Sandy Atlin, current president of JIAS Toronto.

"Every story is equally fascinating and every story deserves to be told," Atlin said. "We hope that many of these family stories, passed orally from generation to generation, will be preserved in the Heritage Book.

JIAS is asking for sponsorship of book space and encouraging individuals, corporations and communal organizations who submit their own heritage to consider donating space for use by the general community.

To simplify the process of submission of material, volunteers, headed by Barbara Stupp, Heritage Book chair, will arrange an appointment to collect photos from participants and ask for a few historical details. Heritage Book editors will then write up the family history from the information provided.

The book will be launched Oct. 27 at the Ford Centre for the Performing Arts at a gala concert starring Toronto singer/actress/playwright and immigrant, Theresa Tova. TV star Ralph Benmergui will MC a star-studded line-up of immigrant talent. The concert is being chaired by Sheila Freeman.

Proceeds raised by the book and gala will be used to provide day camp bursaries and retraining scholarships. Both the book and the gala concert are being organized with the cooperation of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

For more information, call Barbara Stupp or Atlin at office 416-630-6481.

Religious coalition set to meet with Rock

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A coalition of religious groups will meet Justice Minister Allan Rock in Ottawa May 5 to discuss the presence of Nazi war criminals in Canada.

To be led by Rabbi Reuven Bulka of Ottawa's Machzikei Hadas Congregation, the religious leaders will "speak to the moral side" of the long-simmering issue, Rabbi Bulka told The CJN.

He'll be joined by leaders of the Roman Catholic, Anglican, United and Lutheran churches; the World Sikh Organization; and the Canadian Council of Churches.

Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), which arranged the meeting, describes it as a first.

"Religious communities across Canada have joined hands with the Jewish community as a moral voice to ensure that this is not seen as just a Jewish issue, but one that affects all Canadians," said CJC's Bernie Farber.

Allan Rock

Rabbi Reuven Bulka

According to Rabbi Bulka, who chairs CJC's inter-religious affairs committee, getting Ottawa to think about the moral implications of Nazi war criminals living peacefully in this country "is something Canada owes to the young people it sent out to fight the Nazis. The way it behaved after the war made a mockery of all that.

"Somehow, [Canada] must make amends."

Rabbi Bulka said the religious leaders may consider asking Rock for a public apology for Canada's dismal record on pursuing war criminals.

"And to show an apology has teeth, the government would have to go after Nazis with both barrels," Rabbi Bulka said. "This has gone beyond politics."

Irving Abella, chair of CJC's war crimes committee, is also slated to meet with Rock May 5 to discuss Ottawa's ongoing cases against alleged war criminals, as well as recent allegations that anti-Semitic attitudes in the Justice Department's war crimes unit may have hindered prosecutions.

Special reunion planned for Yom Hashoah service

TORONTO — Dr. Constantine Eckhardt will soon be face to face with the woman his mother saved from the Nazis in Poland during World War II. The two will meet for the first time in 50 years at Toronto's Holocaust commemorative service on May 4.

Eckhardt's mother Maria, who died in 1970, is one of three Righteous Among Nations being honored at the community gathering. Israeli Consul General Jehudi Kinar will present the proclamations on behalf of Yad Vashem. Irena and Ignacy Leskowicz and Anna Lesak are the others to be posthumously honored.

Eckhardt, a retired Ryerson Polytechnic University professor, vividly remembers Kalina Kleinberg, the Jewish teenager his mother saved by welcoming her to their two-bedroom apartment in Tarnopol, Poland. "She hid behind a dressing mirror during the day and slept in the kitchen," he recalled.

As a close friend of Eckhardt's brother, Kleinberg was well loved by the family. But Maria Eckhardt's decision to rescue Kleinberg was motivated by more than friendship.

Kleinberg, who now lives in New York, is bringing her husband and four children to Toronto for the ceremony.

Yom Hashoah V'Hagvurah will begin at 1 p.m. with a community march from the Holocaust Education Centre, 4600 Bathurst St., to the Yad Vashem monument in Earl Bales Park. The commemorative program starts at 2 p.m. when historian Irving Abella will deliver an address followed by a candle-lighting ceremony.

This year's community-wide service is being sponsored by the Holocaust Remembrance Committee of UJA Federation, the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem, the Consul General of Israel, the Toronto Board of Rabbis and Toronto's Vaad Harabanim.

Lubavitch transfers Torahs to shul's new home

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

THORNHILL — With barely a backward glance, members of Chabad Lubavitch of Markham transported their Torahs to the synagogue's new home on Green Lane.

Well, that's not totally true. Rabbi Avraham Plotkin, spiritual leader and executive director of the congregation, says that removing the Torah scrolls from what had been their home for nearly 10 years was "the most emotional moment. I was holding back tears. It was a symbol of transition — bringing Yiddishkeit from one place to another."

Rabbi Plotkin is used to doing that. He was sent to Markham some 11 years ago by Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson, the late Lubavitcher rebbe, as part of his campaign to spread Jewish religious life to developing areas.

The congregation began in Rabbi Plotkin's basement, and graduated to an industrial building just behind Thornhill Square in the Bayview and John area. They broke ground for their permanent home last fall.

The new facility, which several speakers at the opening ceremonies noted was completed on time and on budget, is 12,000 square feet, and includes a simple yet elegant sanctuary, with a warm mahogany ark and bimah. The same wood is found on the mechitzah, which is topped with etched smoked glass.

The building also has classrooms, offices, a mikvah, library, a "simcha room" and youth facilities.

On a recent rainy Sunday afternoon, the Torahs were carried in procession down Guardsman Rd., under a chuppah, surrounded by exhuberent men, women and children. They were accompanied by musician Gershon Wachtel.

Rabbi Plotkin told the standing room only crowd in the new synagogue, that the building is a testimony to the secret of Jewish survival. "When things seem blackest, we say that we will build, we will rebuild; we will build and build and build until the coming of the Messiah."

David Wiener, president of the congregation, praised Rabbi Plotkin and his wife Goldie for being warm and non-judgmental, "qualities which became trademarks of our community."

Rabbi Moshe Stern, bringing greetings on behalf of the Vaad Harabonim of Greater Toronto, said that this non-judgemental approach is "the voice of authentic Orthodox Judaism."

Markham mayor Don Cousens said that the opening of Chabad Lubavitch of Markham is "a sign that God is working in our community." After all, he added, "what is a community that doesn't have its roots in faith?"

He announced that a rose garden is being planted near Markham City Hall to commemorate Jerusalem 3000.

Greetings were also brought by Ian Abramowitz, chair of the construction committee; Rabbi Zalman Grossbaum, from Chabad Lubavitch of Southern Ontario; Markham M.P.P. David Tsubouchi; and Rabbi Yehudah Krinsky, from the World Lubavitch Movement in New York. Shul vice-president and building committee chair Eric Inspektor was master of ceremonies.

Also present at the opening ceremonies were rabbis from the Lubavitch and from the general Orthodox communities, Markham councillor and federal candidate for Thornhill riding Bill Fisch, and Sid Soban, also a Thornhill candidate.

The Thornhill Jewish Male Choir presented a selection of songs.

Child-focused group may open new office

TORONTO — Itzhak Mishnayot, director of Bayit Lechol Yeled (A Home for Every Child in Israel), is coming for a two-week, fact-finding mission to explore the possibility of opening a Canadian office.

The purpose of the trip is to introduce the organization, known as a haven for abused and neglected children in Israel, to the Toronto community.

"While we realize that there are a large number of Israel-based organizations in Canada, our research indicates that A Home For Every Child is unique," said Mishnayot in a telephone conversation. "We are an inclusive organization that provides shelter for severely abused and neglected children from all segments of Israeli society. Without our existence, most of these children would have nowhere else to turn. The majority are in immediate danger and urgently need to be removed from their homes."

The organization provides a nurturing, safe, home environment where children receive therapy and comfort for their trauma.

Its main goal is to make it possible, through intensive family therapy, for children to return home and live safely with their biological parents.

The length of a child's stay depends on their situation. In some circumstances, they are allowed to return home under strict supervision. In other cases, they go to foster or adoptive parents.

Services for newborns and children about to be adopted as well as for adoptive parents are also provided.

To meet Mishnayot, who will be here until May 10, call public relations coordinator, Hindy Nosek-Abelson at 416-955-9133.

Chaim Herzog

(1918-1997)

Chaim Herzog was one of the giants of modern Israel, an Irish-born warrior and statesman who left an indelible mark on his country.

He served Israel faithfully as a soldier, parliamentarian, diplomat and, finally, as a two-term president. He was a voice of reason and moderation in an era of ideological and religious excess, and he was a pragmatist who believed that Israel's future is much more important than its past.

A voice of reason and moderation

Although he was a man of many parts, Herzog will best be remembered for an electrifying incident at the United Nations. In 1975, the General Assembly passed an odious resolution equating Zionism with racism. Herzog mounted the rostrum, denounced the resolution as an unjust, arrogant and hate-filled falsehood, and then, in a memorable flourish, tore it in half.

In his recently published memoirs, Living History, Herzog recalled that moment. "Grasping the torn pieces in my hand, I walked back to my seat as the hall erupted into tumultuous and sustained applause. Soaked in sweat, I sat down, exhausted. The speech...would live on." And so it has.

As president, Herzog distinguished himself. He ascended to the office in 1983, when Israel was nursing the wounds it had sustained with its ill-advised invasion of Lebanon. Herzog threw himself into the task of trying to unite the nation after the trauma of the Lebanese misadventure, which he later judged to be "a disaster for Israel." And in the interests of easing Israel's international isolation and burnishing its image, he made 45 visits abroad. To that end, he was remarkably successful. As Israel's representative, he was supremely self-confidant, superbly polished and deeply steeped in Jewish history, culture and religion. As a result, he rarely failed to impress interlocutors with reasoned arguments on Israel's behalf.

Considered himself a soldier first

Since he was a mentsh, and his interests ranged far and wide, Herzog was not loathe to address a plethora of issues. He worked for the integration of Israel's Arab community into the mainstream of Israeli society. He sought to expose and isolate the rabble-rousers in Rabbi Meir Kahane's racist Kach party. He denounced Jewish vigilantism as a breach of the rule of law. He lobbied for a political system which would not be beholden to small parties. He lamented the toll on Israel's highways. He urged Israelis to protect the environment. But, being fallible, he committed his share of mistakes, the most egregious being the pardon of members of the Jewish underground and of Shin Bet agents who had been involved in the notorious Bus 300 affair.

Despite his numerous accomplishments, Herzog, first and foremost, considered himself a soldier. Yet, he was no ordinary soldier, as his resumé attests. He joined the Haganah as a teenager and returned to its ranks after distinguishing himself as a British army intelligence officer in World War II. During and after the War of Independence, Herzog was director of Israeli military intelligence, and when he retired from the army, his home away from home, he dabbled in business and practised law.

As well, he was a radio commentator and an author, a broadcaster who calmed the nation in times of armed conflict with the Arabs and a stylist whose erudite and thoroughly-researched books on Israel's wars were critically acclaimed.

Chaim Herzog was a man for all seasons, a person whose life will doubtless be a source of inspiration to his fellow Israelis. S.K.

Why Israel is security conscious

Your report (April 10) that Palestinians are shown to favor bombings over the peace process should come as no surprise.

Assuming the worst — that the commencement of the Jewish housing project south of Jerusalem is an inarguable violation of the Oslo accords (when in fact it is not) — nothing, but nothing, can justify the barbarous act by a programmed suicidal bomber to murder and maim innocent civilians.

The absolutely preposterous statement by Hamas following such incidents that it claims responsibility is an affront to all civilized and law abiding persons. If Yasser Arafat had one scintilla of sincerity instead of lamely expressing opposition to terror he would brand Hamas as a criminal organization and hold its leaders responsible for encouraging, abetting and training these hired assassins who are duped into believing that their ultimate reward lies in an after life.

After each atrocity, there are predictable and obviously insincere statements from Muslim leaders to the effect that Islam condemns acts of violence and murder, and yet wild celebrations of approval and praise for such despicable acts take place in Nablus, Gaza and elsewhere. Clearly the masses who rejoice in such evil do not do so spontaneously, but rather through provocative speeches from leaders both religious and political.

It must take a special kind of coward to attach dynamite and explosives to indoctrinated and demented young people and send them off to kill innocent women and children, while of course, lacking the courage and conviction to execute such atrocities in person. If this is the stuff of leadership and thousands endorse and rejoice in such acts, can any reasonable person really question Israel's preoccupation with security and self-preservation.

The non-establishment Jews deserve study

Re: "Mysteries of Jewish Identity" by Morton Weinfeld (CJN, April 1).

There is a sector of Jews who consciously do not belong to any synagogue or Zionist affiliation and are not part of the recognized establishment.

These Jews do not deny their Jewishness. On the contrary, they are quite proud of their heritage, their culture and their history. In the past, some may have been (and some still are) bundists socialists, left-wing Zionists, free thinkers, atheists, agnostics, radicals.

At present some belong to the various Jewish secular humanist groups and try to practise their Jewishness or Judaism there.

Many of the above mentioned Jews are looking for something more meaningful than what the organized religious community and the never-ending fundraising institutions have to offer.

I agree with Morton Weinfeld that these Jews are worthy of more study by researchers of modern Jewish life.

Does Israeli policy favor full-scale war?

Yasser Arafat has neither abrogated nor amended his party's overly anti-Israel covenant, which calls for the outright destruction of Israel through holy jihad (holy war). Even more blinding to the eyes is the sight of an Israeli government eager to deal away its homeland to these same people calling for war.

According to the Israeli government, it is wrong for a Palestinian to strap himself with explosives in order to kill innocent Israeli citizens. Testimony to this belief is the government's policy of placing curfews and sealing off sections of the West Bank and Gaza. How often though, have you seen the Israeli government place the same sanctions on the PLO for calling on Israel's destruction? Never. Instead, the government tends to routinely reward and appeal to Palestinian demands by recently offering nine percent of the West Bank and releasing convicted Hamas terrorists.

Judging from the government's policies, it would appear outrageous to accept individual Palestinian terror, but all the more logical to accept a full scale Palestinian war. One can only guess at the prospect of a lasting peace, while the Palestinian charter remains fully intact in its original form without the slightest assurance of its amendment.

CJN Clarification

In the letter "Secular Jews do their part" (CJN, April 10), Elsa Rosenberg commented on a statement by "a young Orthodox Jew" that the existence of Orthodoxy (or Orthodox Jews) enables secular Jews to exist.

In fact the student in question is not Orthodox but Conservative. His original comment read in part, "Maybe I wouldn't pick that lifestyle, but I think the Orthodox play a really important role in the community." (Our emphasis.)

Chaim Herzog: 1918 - 1997

Israel loses soldier, statesman, author

By URIEL HEILMAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

Chaim Herzog, statesman, author and sixth president of Israel, died April 16 of heart failure, at Sheba hospital in Tel Hashomer, after contracting pneumonia on a recent visit to the United States. He was 79.

"I lost a very close friend," said Nissan Limor, director-general of the president's residence during the Herzog years.

Limor visited Herzog in the hospital three days earlier, where he said Herzog was putting the finishing touches on the Hebrew edition of his upcoming autobiography.

President Ezer Weizman, who served in battle with Herzog during the War of Independence, called Herzog a talented man and a good friend.

Born in Belfast, Northern Ireland, on Sept. 17, 1918, Chaim Herzog, called Vivian as a child, was the eldest son of Ireland's Chief Rabbi Yitzhak Herzog, who later became Ashkenazi chief rabbi of Israel.

Educated at Cambridge University and the University of London, where he earned his doctoral degree in law, Herzog made aliyah in 1935 and studied at the Hebron Yeshivah and Talmudic Seminary for two years before joining the Haganah.

He enlisted in the British army on the eve of World War II, fought against the Nazis, participated in the landing at Normandy and served in various military campaigns in France and Germany.

As a high-ranking officer in British intelligence at the end of the war, Herzog served as one of the interrogators of Heinrich Himmler and participated in the first Jewish displaced persons' conference at Bergen-Belsen.

...the soldier

Three years later, he saw battle again during the Israeli War of Independence, where he fought as an operations officer for the Seventh Brigade. After the formation of the IDF, he served in a variety of capacities until his military retirement as head of the general staff of the Intelligence Branch in 1962.

Herzog could not stay away from the military for long, however, and in the months leading up to the Six Day War, he became the leading military commentator for Israel Broadcasting. After Israel's stunning military victory, he assumed the role of first military commander of the West Bank for several months before returning to civilian life as a lawyer and businessman.

The people of Israel will never forget the role Herzog played and his calming words during the Six Day War, Knesset Speaker Dan Tichon said last week.

During the 1969 elections, Herzog became a leading candidate for the Labor party, serving in the Knesset for several years before being appointed Israel's ambassador to the United Nations (UN) in 1975. At the UN, he won broad national support for his frequent public demonstrations against anti-Israel forces in the General Assembly.

...with his family

When the UN passed the infamous Zionism equals racism resolution, Herzog tore up the anti-Zionist resolution in front of a Manhattan audience of over 100,000 people, who gave him a deafening welcome when he declared: "I tore it up on your behalf and thus, for us Jews, it no longer exists."

After he returned to Israel in 1978, Herzog frequently spoke on the radio and was quoted in the press for his criticism of the Menachem Begin government and his views on the Lebanon War. In the late 1970s and early '80s, Herzog founded and chaired the Committee for Concerned Citizens, met with Egyptian President Anwar al-Sadat during peace talks, and was elected to the tenth Knesset in 1981.

The well-known soldier, parliamentarian, statesman, lawyer and author succeeded Yitzhak Navon as president of the State of Israel in 1983.

During his 10 years as president, Herzog hosted 11,000 official receptions, received more than one million letters and petitions from citizens, and travelled all over the country and the world, making 45 official presidential visits and addressing 13 foreign parliaments, a Jewish record.

...with Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Shamir.

Herzog incurred occasional criticism for his frequent absences from Israel, as well as for his granting of presidential clemency to members of the Jewish underground and Shin Bet agents who had murdered an Arab terrorist taken prisoner in a bus hijacking incident in 1984.

"I saved the Shin Bet," maintained Herzog several years ago in an interview with the Jerusalem Post. "I got 95 percent negative feedback from the press, but 87 percent of the public supported me," he said.

With a commitment to tradition that was strengthened by his religious upbringing, the only kosher president in the world occasionally had to work his way through uncomfortable situations, such as when, on a visit to China, the food the presidential delegation brought from Israel ran out.

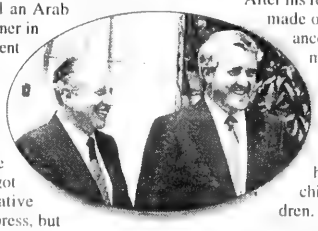
According to Herzog, the group survived on fruit, vegetables and rice for the remainder of their visit.

...with Irving Abella , North York Mayor Mel Lastman and federal cabinet minister Barbara Mc Dougall at York University in Toronto.

"Herzog was a military man, president, son of rabbis and man of the modern age," said Shimon Peres.

After his retirement in 1993, Herzog made occasional public appearances and was able to devote more time to his favorite pastimes near his home in Herzliya Pituah: golf and being with his grandchildren.

Herzog is survived by his wife Aura, their four children and their grandchildren.



...with Prime Minister Brian Mulroney in Montreal

...with Israeli Prime Minister Golda Meir.

...as Israel's ambassador to the United Nations.

Bill splits the Jewish people

Every year at the Yizkor service on the last day of Passover, I remember Rabbi Samuel Schafler who oversaw my conversion to Judaism years ago, when he was rabbi of Temple Gates of Prayer in Flushing, N.Y. At the time of his death at Pesach in 1991, he was president of Hebrew College in Boston.

By Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

I wrote about him in the wake of the death of Yitzhak Rabin, and again I look back at what he believed, in order to make some sense of the current situation in Israel.

I refer to the recent bill passed by the Knesset that would, in a sense, invalidate the smichah of Conservative and Reform rabbis. Since their conversions in Israel will not be recognized, they are not considered rabbis — unless they get on a plane and leave Israel.

This is a bill designed to split the people of Israel, both in the land and in the Diaspora, into hostile, confrontational and ultimately self-destructive camps. How Netanyahu could allow it to come to pass is easy to see; after all, he relies on the Shasniks and others in his government, not on me or my congregation, for his support. How he can not see the damage he is doing is beyond me.

What has this to do with my memory of the rabbi?

Rabbi Schafler was a man of incredible energy, wit, charm and intellect.

You would never get the standard sermon from him on Shabbat (in the first one I heard he was castigating his congregation for honoring university students when they came home from college — where were they and their parents the rest of the year? he asked). He wrote a PhD dissertation on the history of the Maccabean period, a period he believed had much in common with our own. His contributions to Jewish education in North America were legion, his commitment to the State of Israel unwavering — as was his opposition to egalitarian services, although I like to think he was reconsidering this the last time we talked.

Rabbi was devoted to ahavat Israel

His wife Sarah said at his memorial service: "The last two decades of my husband's life were devoted to creating unity and ahavat Israel among Jews of all denominations and within in the non-Jewish world."

That is why I think of him today.

He tried to impart the meaning of ahavat Israel to me, to his congregations, to his students and teachers. It is obvious that the lesson upon which he labored is being lost.

What does it mean, to make it a law of the state that rabbis of certain ordinations are not rabbis? Or are they only rabbis outside the land of Israel?

To me it means that there will shortly be two kinds of Jews, the kind recognized by the Orthodox (everywhere, not just in Israel) and everybody else; and that the legislature of Israel is now the arbiter, not only of who is a Jew, but of whatever halachic decision the Orthodox rabbinic establishment in Israel wants, decided on their terms.

How soon will it be before all conversions, in or out of Israel, must be validated by the rabbinate in Israel? How soon will it be before the Israeli parliament makes another halachic decision?

When I say a Yizkor prayer for my rabbi this year, I will know that I have not been able to learn his lesson, that I am consumed by anger at what the Jewish state is doing to me, my children, my friends and their families.

We have made public cause with Israel, in good times and bad; we have visited Israel, sent our children there, rejoiced in the Jewish state.

What happens when children of converts make their trip to the land and find out there are those who refuse them the name of Jew? What if the Conservative movement ceased sending its children on pilgrimage? What if we turned our federation gifts to local Jewish institutions rather than giving to Israel, and chose our Israel charities on a personal rather than communal basis?

Netanyahu doesn't need our vote. He has said he doesn't need our money; and now, I am afraid, he is about to say he doesn't need many of our Jews.

I wish I could ask these questions of my rabbi, ask him to teach me, once again, the connection between Jew and Jew, before it is too late.

You can't break a shook

This story might more appropriately be recalled around Yom Kippur, but since it took place one Passover, like the story of the exodus from Egypt, it will be told now.

By Shel Krakofsky in London

There is a family in this city who for over three decades has opened their home to students on Shabbat and other Jewish holidays. Their hospitality is legendary. Hundreds of students over the years have savored the bountiful meals and goodwill of festive occasions at this home away from home, in ways some of the students never before experienced.

The Passover seders of this large family, as can be imagined, are plentiful and joyous. One year, in addition to the family and several students, a businessman in the community with no seder of his own to attend was also a guest and participant at the proceedings.

This businessman, Mr. Rubin (not his real name), announced at the beginning of the seder that he would give $5 to whoever found the afikoman.

Passover, like all Jewish holy and holidays, provides a time for family and communal coming together. This time for delight is also tempered with reflection.

Every date on the Jewish calendar has significant lessons to teach about history, traditions and ethics. These holidays are in many ways the best of all possible educational tools. For many, the Passover seder is the most popular with its drama, dialogue and delicacies.

Perhaps it has become too commercial as we have taken cues from the general culture and merely given a nod to what is important while only emphasizing the easiest aspects of our heritage. Spare me the chocolate-covered matzah, which I somehow doubt our ancestors carried on their backs while dashing out of Egypt.

Anyway, as this particular seder was winding down, one of the young children of the hosts took a graduate student outside the dining room to share his good fortune.

He told the student he had found the afikoman that his father had hidden several hours earlier. "I'm going to get the five dollars," he excitedly told his older confidante. "I found the afikoman!"

"That's great," said the student. "But you know, Mr. Rubin is a very wealthy man. He can afford to give you more. Go in and negotiate for more money."

"I can't," replied the young boy.

"Of course you can," urged the student. "Ask him for more money. He'll give it to you."

The youngster was adamant. "No I can't."

"What not?"

"Because," argued the boy, about seven at the time. "You can't break a shook."

Confused, the student didn't understand what the boy was chattering about. "What do you mean?" he asked.

The young lad explained, "I already showed Mr. Rubin the afikoman and we shook hands on the five dollars. It's a deal. We shook. You can't break a shook. Don't you understand? A shook is a shook. You can't break it."

The boy had already been taught an important lesson by his family. And come to think of it, this is indeed an important Passover lesson. Pharaoh kept breaking his promises. In contrast, this boy had learned from his parents the importance of keeping one's word.

Whatever happened to all of these people? Mr. Rubin recently died. The family continues with its extraordinary hospitality. The graduate student who wanted the young boy to renegotiate the terms of his Passover contract now gets to negotiate regularly as the chief executive of a large organization.

The boy, now a young man, currently lives in Australia with his wife and growing family. By all accounts, he is a chip off the old block and has carried on with the generosity of his parents.

The youngster who learned early in life that "you can't break a shook" — he became a rabbi.

The poor among us

Now that the days are becoming warmer and the Out of the Cold programs have shut down, the homeless will once again become visible. They may accost you at a subway or play some music for passersby, who would rather be left alone and not be reminded that poverty has a human face.

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Montreal statistics are not at hand for me, but Toronto's worsening record is. In an article in Family Matters, the executive director of the Jewish Federation of Family and Child service, Gordon Wolfe, has laid out some of the bare facts.

In Metropolitan Toronto, a staggering one in three children relies on welfare. Young people under 19 years of age make up close to 50 percent of our food bank users. As for Jews, 13 percent of our people live below or near the poverty line. One in 10 Jewish children under the age of 14 lives in poverty. Persons in single parent families are two to three times more likely to be poor than those who live in husband/wife families.

Those who immigrated to Canada in the last 10 years account for about 10 percent of the Jewish community, but they make up about 18 percent of the Jewish poor. In other words, poverty affects almost one in six Jews in Toronto, yet it continues to be under-recognized by many people in our community.

Says Wolfe: "The impact of poverty on children is dramatic. Poor children are at greater risk educationally, dropping out of school at almost three times the rate of children from non-poor families. Poverty undermines families and the well-being of children in other ways too. These children are often hungry or inadequately nourished and many live in overcrowded housing. Poverty also seems intertwined with inadequate parenting skills and inconsistent parental behavior. Poor parents, working, raising children alone and having few supports, become overwhelmed, further lessening their children's odds of developing normally."

We are told that there is no communal money available, but in my book poverty is something that we cannot afford, regardless of our communal budget.

Dr. Paul Steinhauer, a well-known psychiatrist, recently wrote: "We believe that it costs significantly less, and achieves more, to invest in supporting child development early than it does to pay later for increased health services, remedial education services, police and court services, for custody of young offenders, for foster care for the cost of supporting — sometimes for their whole lives — adults who fail to become self-reliant and productive members of society."

To be sure, our Torah (Deuteronomy 15:11) tells us that poverty will always be with us — but it does not tell us that, because of this, we are to stop caring. In the Jewish frame of living, tzedekah is not charity but obligation.Only our communal will and our individual sense of obligation will help to remedy a situation that an affluent community such as ours should never tolerate.

Think about this when, at your seder, the matzah is lifted to the words, Ha lachma anya, "this is the bread of poverty." It was ours once, and all too many still have none other.

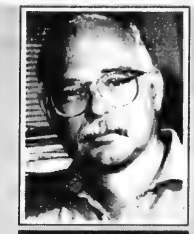
Zukerman's magnetic happening flourishes



By Sheldon Kirshner

The Toronto Jewish Film Festival has conquered the city by storm, and if anyone can take credit for its conception and success, it is an elfin philanthropist named Helen Zukerman.

Marking its fifth anniversary next month, the festival has become exactly what Zukerman, a former Montrealer, had hoped it would be: a magnetic happening which brings Jews from all walks of life and opinion together for at least one week of fun.

The inaugural festival in 1993 presented 18 films and attracted 7,000 viewers. This year's event, which is scheduled to be held from May 1-8 at the Bloor Theatre in downtown Toronto, has a lineup of 30 movies from 10 countries, including shorts, and is expected to match or surpass 1995's attendance figure of 15,000.

The festival, the second largest of its kind in North America after that of San Francisco's, enjoys widespread appeal because, in Zukerman's words, "it is non-threatening." It cuts across national, religious, political and organizational lines, encompasses an enormous age range and, to her satisfaction, attracts non-Jews. "I don't want it to be a festival for Jews, but a Jewish film festival."

Zukerman, who describes herself as a "cultural Jew" rather than a "synagogue Jew," conceived it in 1992, knowing full well that it had been tried twice before in Toronto with disappointing results.

The administrator and trustee of a charitable foundation created in her husband's memory, Zukerman had given Francine Zuckerman, no relation, financial help with the submission of her Holocaust documentary, Half the Kingdom, to the San Francisco Jewish Film Festival.

Why not, she wondered, take it one step further and work for the establishment of a similar festival in Toronto? Burning with enthusiasm, she called John Katz, a professor of cinema at York University, and he heartily endorsed her proposal.

"We were off," she said. "It took us three months to get it off the ground."

With a generous infusion from her foundation, the festival was officially launched. "People loved it and wanted to be part of it," she recalled. "In our second year, we got corporate sponsors and patrons." This year, with a donation, the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto has also jumped on the bandwagon.

She is pleased that Toronto is not the only city in Canada with a Jewish film festival. Toronto's festival will be followed by Montreal's (May 8-14), Edmonton's (May 24-26) and Vancouver's (May 26-29 and June 2-5).

Zukerman, 53 and the mother of two grown daughters, has been a film fan all her life. The scion of Polish immigrants who arrived in Montreal from Lublin and Warsaw more than 60 years ago, and subsequently lived in the St. Urbain/Hutchison/Mount Royal ghetto, she remembers watching matinees at the old Van Horne Theatre.

Zukerman's father, Louis Freedman, a left-wing leather cutter who was one of the organizers of Montreal's first handbag union, encouraged his daughter's interest. On weekly summer visits to the family's rented cottage in the Laurentians ("the mountains"), he rarely showed up without a reel of silent movies in hand.

Since her mother, Jessie, was a garment worker as well, Zukerman was effectively raised by her grandmother, Yetta, who taught her Yiddish, her mother tongue. Like a roster of Montreal Jews, Zukerman was educated at Bancroft and Van Horne elementary schools and graduated from Northmount High School.

A good student, Zukerman set her sights on university, but never attended one because Bell Telephone promoted her four times in her first year as a filing clerk. Years later, she studied at Seneca College in Toronto and received a social service diploma.

Having been raised in a home where strong social justice views prevailed, it is hardly surprising that Zukerman is fond of giving away money to favorite causes. Among them are the New Israel Fund, of which she is past president; the Kolel, the liberal Jewish learning centre; and McGill University (where Barry, her late husband who died in 1987, studied).

With an infectious child-like enthusiasm, Zukerman looks forward to next week's Toronto Jewish Film Festival.

"We have a nice Canadian program, six films from Israel and a world premiere (The Return of Sarah's Daughters, an American filmmaker's quest for her Jewish roots)."

In addition, Exodus 1947 purports to tell the "real story" of that Palestine-bound ship, not "the Paul Newman version," while Sabbath in Amsterdam, a Dutch silent film from 1932, is probably the most exotic film of the festival. "It grabs you by the throat," said Zukerman, whose team includes director of programming Shlomo Schwartzberg and director of development Debra Kwinter.

Looking ahead, Zukerman hopes to lengthen the festival's run to two weeks and to place it in a multi-screen theatre. "But above all, I want it to be what it is now — Jews celebrating Jews."

Books of note...

I'd like to bring several interesting books to your attention.

Jonathan Kaufman, a Pulitzer Prize winning journalist on the staff of the Wall Street Journal, has written a poignant account of Jewish survival in Europe. A Hole in the Heart of the World (Viking, $33.95) probes the lives of four Jewish families and one Catholic family in Berlin, Warsaw and Prague and, through their diverse experiences, discovers timeless verities.

Meyer Levin, the novelist, helped bring Anne Frank's diary to the United States. The diary, he thought, would further his mission of conveying the enormity of the Holocaust to an American audience. Little did he realize that his warm and pivotal relationship with Otto Frank — Anne's father — would turn sour and embroil him in a bitter trans-national dispute that would alter his life and shed new light on the Holocaust heroine. In An Obsession with Anne Frank (University of California Press, no price listed), Lawrence Graver skillfully puts the controversy into perspective.

From Tehran to the West Bank, Islamic fundamentalism is a force to be reckoned with in the Middle East. Judith Miller, a seasoned New York Times correspondent, examines it in God Has Ninety-Nine Names (Simon & Schuster, $40). Leavened by personal vignettes, her portrait of this phenomenon in Iran, the Arab world and Israel is enlightening and disturbing.

Dean Beeby, a Canadian Press reporter, tells a fascinating World War II tale in Cargo of Lies (University of Toronto Press, $29.95). Using formerly classified documents, he relates the story of a German spy whom the RCMP turned into a double agent.

Tom Bower's Nazi Gold HarperCollins, $35.50) is a devastating critique of the conduct of the Swiss government and its banking system during and after World War II. Drawing upon heretofore unpublished sources, Bower claims that Swiss banks and companies, aided and abetted by the government, laundered Nazi gold, sold munitions and raw materials to Germany and deliberately restricted and prevented Jews from searching for dormant accounts. An extremely sobering book.

There is a mitzvah to beautify mitzvot

By RABBI REUVEN TRADBURKS

In the Torah reading of the seventh day of Pesach, the Jews cross the sea and sing the Shira, the Song at the Sea. One verse of this song is zeh keli v'anvahu, "this is my G-d v'anvahu." This word, v'anvahu, is given a number of explanations, one of which is derived from the word n'ah to beautify: "This is my G-d and I will beautify Him." How do we beautify G-d? By beautifying His mitzvot.

The Talmud says that it is a mitzvah to have a beautiful tallit, a beautiful Torah, a beautiful lulav, a beautiful sukkah. Besides performing the mitzvah, we are commanded to make it beautiful. The sofer, when he writes a Torah, a mezuzah or t'fillin, etches lines into the parchment so that each handwritten line is straight and starts and finishes in a straight line (like the fully-justified mode on the word processor, except done by hand). When we open the Torah, it is strikingly beautifully written, each column lining up.

We decorate our sukkah, not just to involve the children in the mitzvah, but because it is a mitzvah to have a beautiful sukkah. We tie the lulav so that the leaves stay tightly together, a more striking image than if they were apart.

By making the mitzvot beautiful, we ourselves are drawn to them. Mitzvot become enjoyable and attractive. We get excited about them and want to do them.

On Pesach, there is a tendency to moan and groan about the matzah and the cleaning, framing the yom tov in our minds as a burden and not as a pleasure. The preparations for Pesach are time consuming and tiring, true enough. The consumption of matzah is not as physically pleasant as eating soft challah, true enough. However, all the mitzvot are to draw us nearer by their beauty. Our job is to make the mitzvot a pleasure, something that we love and look forward to. The truth is that we do look forward to yom tov. Which do we emphasize in our mind and in our speech — our excitement or our aching back? We have to be careful in the expressions we use and the impressions we create for our children — not of the burden of Pesach but our love and excitement for it.

Besides creating the esthetic beauty of mitzvot, may we all continue to create the internal beauty of love and excitement for the mitzvot.

Some simchah stops you can visit on the Web

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

You are cordially invited to attend the weddings of Mike and Na'ama Cohen. And Russell and Deborah Rothstein. And Yishai and Yaara Garbash.

Never met them? No problem. Now you can thanks to the Jewish Highway.

With Passover underway, we are in the 49-day period of Sefirat Ha'Omer-The Counting of the Omer [http://www.virtual.co.il/city_services/holidays/pesach/omer1.htm] and [http://www.ort.org/anjy/therev/omer.htm].

This is traditionally a time of semi-mourning in which public celebrations such as weddings are not held. So what better time to discuss weddings?

Why now? Because as Shavuot approaches, the marriage floodgates open and the hottest wedding season of the year is suddenly upon us. So if you are planning yours right now and are looking for some ideas, here are some simchah stops you can visit on the World Wide Web.

There are several excellent overviews of the customs and traditions leading from engagement through the wedding day. Visit Ohr Somayach's Jewish Wedding Ceremony [http://www.virtual.co.il/education/education/ohr/judaism/articles/wedding.htm], the Shaarey Zedek Wedding Guide [http://uscj.org/michigan/s-fielcs/wedgde.html] from the Conservative congregation in Southfield, Mich., and the Chabad Wedding Guide [gopher://gopher.chabad.org:70/11/guide/wedding]. I also recommend Eliezer Segal's series of thought-provoking articles at [http://acs6.acs.ucalgary.ca/~elsegal/Shokel/Weddings_Index.html]

The Kallah Guide [http://www.kallah.com/] is a site geared to the Orthodox community but also has helpful checklists and suggestions for a general audience. One interesting area is "My Most Embarrassing Bridal Experience" [http://kallah.com/TIPS/TIPS.htm]. Chumi T. of Brooklyn recounts her ordeal: "One night I went out with this really nice guy. He took me to a lounge. After we sat and talked for a while as we drank our Cokes he excused himself to the bathroom. After almost an hour of sitting there alone I gave up on the guy. I was really disappointed but he called me later on apologizing profusely. In the bathroom he had gotten mugged and the idiot who mugged him had stolen his pants!"

A more direct way of sharing expertise and questions about weddings is through the Liberal Judaism Category Index. This large site is basically a meeting place where Reform Jews can address issues that concern their community. In the Marriage section [http://www.compclass.com/mlj/category/c36.html] there are discussions about everything from "Conversion and marriage" to "Must it be the groom who breaks the wedding glass?"

One way that Jewish couples express their hopes and wishes for their life together is through an illustrated ketubah or marriage contract.

As well as being able to sample some gorgeous ketubot on the Internet, several couples have decided to share their special moments with anyone who cares to click in. Yishai Garbash and Yaara DiSegni created their "WEBding" site because "We have lots of friends on the Net, we felt we couldn't have a wedding without them." [http://www.macom.co.il/WEBding/index.html]

You can also visit the weddings of Sandra and Andrew J. Cohen [http://gnv.fdt.net/~sandrew/] and Russell Rothstein and Deborah Fass [http://rpcp.mit.edu:80/~rir/wedding.html].

But nothing beats the marriage of Mike and Na'ama Cohen [http://www.613.org/video/wedd.ram]. This 17-minute on-line video of the Cohen wedding can be viewed complete with a very lively audio soundtrack. From the pre-wedding reception to the chupah to the singing and dancing, you are there. The quality of the video depends on your setup.

I got about 15 images per minute and very clear audio with a 28.8K modem. In order to view the Cohen Wedding, you will need RealPlayer 4.0 beta free software [http://get.real.com/products/player/download.html]. And you will also need a fairly powerful computer. (But isn't that a small price to pay for the honor of attending this simchah?)

So to newlyweds Na'ama and Mike, Yaara and Yishai, Deborah and Russell, thanks for the invitations. And to everyone else planning their wedding both on the Jewish Highway or the more conventional route, Mazel Tov!

Coming to terms with the Holocaust

Yossel Rakover Speaks to God*, by Zvi Kolitz (KTAV Publishing, no price indicated).

Theresienstadt: The Town the Nazis Gave to the Jews*, by Vera Schiff (Lugus, $18).

God, Faith & The Holocaust*, by Irena Bakowska (Karijan Publishing, $12).

The Neppi Modona Diaries*, edited by Kate Cohen (University Press of New England, $24.95 US).

Fragments*, by Binjamin Wilkomirsky (Schocken Books, $27.95).

From Poland to Russia & Back 1939-1946*, by Samuel Hong (Black Moss Press, $15.95).

How does one come to terms with the Holocaust? Even after 50 years, the stark horror of six million murdered Jews is simply too numbing to comprehend. Genocide is beyond our intellectual or emotional grasp. In North America, happily, it is too far removed from our personal experience.

Those who experienced the Holocaust at first hand are gradually passing from the scene. In spite of the agony of recall, they feel obligated to tell their story, to indicate how this unrestrained orgy of human bestiality was unleashed, to ponder what it is in the human psyche — in our cultural, social and political institutions — that made it possible. They owe this not only to the victims, but to future generations. There is, of course, also the need for emotional release, a catharsis through the act of writing and recollection.

The seven books under review are valiant and worthy attempts to describe the indescribable. They deserve a wide and empathic readership.

Yossel Rakover Speaks to God, is the wrenching meditation of a Polish chassidic Jew, addressed to God, just before he perishes in the ruins of the Warsaw ghetto. For many years this searing document was considered authentic, until its author was discovered to be Zvi Kolitz, an Israeli journalist and teacher now living in New York.

Rakover declares, like a modern Job, that he will continue to believe in God no matter how much he is pushed into disbelief. He cries out defiantly, "I love Him, but I love His Torah more, and even if I had deceived myself in this regard, I would, nevertheless, cling to His Torah." God may hide His face but Rakover speaks as a tormented soul who is unwilling to desert either his faith or his rationality.

This heart-wrenching, shocking stance, raises profound spiritual questions. The book includes a related Holocaust story by Kolitz, together with a series of related essays by a number of Jewish and Christian theologians.

In 1948, a Prague teenager, Vera Schiff, was sent with her parents to the Theresienstadt concentration camp. When she emerged in 1945, she learned that her entire family of 50 — counting relatives on both sides — had perished. They had been "turned into ashes."

Her account of life in the camp is replete with arresting and gripping detail. She describes the visit of the three-person inspection team (two Red Cross representatives and a member of the Danish Foreign Ministry) who came to report on the treatment of Jews. The Nazis engaged in a gigantic pantomime — all camp evils were temporarily eliminated or disguised. The inmates were rendered mute or acquiescent. The obtuse trio "never saw the real housing, the crowded hospital, the starved and dirty inmates — they never wanted to see the reality." As the camp orchestra played pleasant music, groups of well dressed inmates discussed intellectual questions under the "benevolent auspices of the Germans."

The author has ineradicable memories of the impotent Jewish Council of Elders and of the terrifying selection process in which inmates were casually either sent to their death or given a further lease on life.

The death marches of Jews in the final months of the war were especially cruel and inhuman.

The author was liberated by the Russian army, returned to Communist Prague and in 1949, made her way to Israel. After some years, she and her loved ones emigrated to Canada.

This is a riveting, well-written account of courage and fortitude.

Irena Bakowska, a professor of law at Queen's University, Kingston, Ont., experienced the horrors of the Warsaw ghetto and the loss of dear ones. Her slender book of personal reflections includes an unusual mystical fantasy in which Hitler's soul seeking admission into Heaven tries to justify his actions and beliefs. For the author, this is a creative and novel way to probe complex and difficult questions.

Another segment of the volume presents a three-way conversation involving a man of religious faith, his agnostic opponent and a woman who believes in a God who has no concern for human beings. Here again, in a daring fashion, the author is able to deal with unresolved and nagging questions: the nature of faith, the role of prayer, the mystery of Jewish survival, the horror of the Holocaust, the hiding of God's face.

During the Holocaust, Italian Jews were a numerically tiny group — fewer than 50,000. About 7,000 of them perished between the years of 1943 and 1945. Some were fervent adherents of the fascist cause. Several hundred were in the ranks of Mussolini's Black Shirts, who in 1921, successfully marched on Rome and installed their leader. Actually, some Italian Jews in their misplaced patriotism displayed fierce anti-Zionist feelings. They believed, even when they became objects of persecution, that Mussolini's anti-Semitism was different from Hitler's. When his "racial laws" were introduced in 1938, Jews and Gentiles alike were stunned.

Roughly 85 percent of Italian Jewry survived. According to a historian of the period, the Italian Holocaust was, "a twisted legacy — a blend of courage and cowardice, nobility and degradation, self-sacrifice and opportunism." In contrast to other countries, perhaps, the worthy behavior outweighed the unworthy, but the horror was nonetheless real.

The Neppi Modona Diaries involves four interwoven accounts that reveal the paradoxical nature of the Jewish-fascist fusion.

After the war, Kate Cohen, a distant cousin, sought out her relatives, members of the well known and respected Neppi Modona family.

In this polyphonic description of breakdown the family members deal with aspects of suffering and persecution as they are divorced from the cultural and social life of the nation, deprived of their homes, jobs and possessions and forced into hiding as outcasts.

Cohen, a skilful editor, provides an introductory chapter on salient events in Italian Jewish relations, both before and after the war. In a concluding segment of the book entitled, Readings she comments on problems of Jewish identity, racism, loyalty and assimilation and the altered nature of post-Holocaust society.

Fragments is the extraordinary memoir of a small boy who spent his childhood in Nazi death camps. It is the result of his efforts as an adult to resurrect repressed memories with the help of a psychiatrist.

* * *

From Poland to Russia and Back is the absorbing memoir of one of the 250,000 Polish Jews who fled to the Soviet Union and survived.

Much of his event-filled story takes place in labor camps from Siberia to the Urals.

These six books — and others like them — are of supreme importance. Those who emerged from a manmade Gehenna should remind us of how it was. From such knowledge flows strength and resolution to those who read.

Media Coverage of the Middle East: Fact or Fiction?

Wednesday, April 30 at 7pm

Is the media coverage biased against Israel or are we too sensitive as Jews? Why is there so much reporting of the Middle East compared to other 'hot spots' in the world? Are there news articles that seem inflammatory, headlines that are misleading or pictures that do not represent the article? Is television coverage better or worse? What is the truth and can it be presented to the world in 90 second sound bites? Three outstanding journalists tackle this contentious issue.

Zimriya marks Zionism centennial

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The 1997 Zimriya, the Jewish school choir festival, this year marked the 100th anniversary of the first Zionism Congress in Basel, Switzerland in August 1897.

More than 600 students from 11 supplementary and day schools performed in the annual event sponsored by the Board of Jewish Education (BJE) and hosted for the second year in a row by Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue. Some 2,000 people enjoyed the upbeat atmosphere of the event.

In his opening remarks, Joseph Steiner, chair of the BJE, told the audience that one of the most rewarding aspects of Zimriya is that it draws people from many diverse parts of the community. "As a community we don't get together enough," he said.

Participating schools included Associated Hebrew Schools which fielded two choirs, Bialik Hebrew Day School, Shearim Hebrew Day School, Kadima School, Beth Tikvah Congregational School, United Synagogue Day Schools (USDS), United Congregational Schools (UCS), Shaar Shalom Religious School, Netivot HaTorah Day School, Temple Kol Ami Religious School and Leo Baeck Day School.

To accommodate the large number of participants and their families, the program was divided into morning or afternoon sessions. The choirs performed many songs from the pioneering days in Israel, such as Kum Bachur Atsel, Rad Ha'laylah, Nivne Artzenu and Arum dem Fyer.

"I found it very gratifying to see the parents and grandparents singing along with the children. They were sharing their history," BJE program coordinator Joyce Levine, the organizer of Zimriya, told The CJN.

The highlight of the event was a special presentation in Yiddish — Voo Bistou Geven — sung by four young female soloists in the morning and five in the afternoon. Bialik Hebrew teacher Rifka Atzmony, Zimriya stage manager, conducted this presentation which involved the talents of participants from some half dozen schools.

Some of the contributors to this year's event included Cantor Efraim Sapir, the musical director of Zimriya; Nella Koren, mass choir leader; Atzmony; Doron Ophir, music arranger for the mass choir; musicians Darren Kagal and Don Englert; sound technician Richard Horbatiuk; and scenery artist Tova Raz.

A Passover letter from 1775

MONTREAL — On April 17, 1775, eight months before Montreal was captured by an invading American army, Richard Dobie, a wealthy local wheat exporter, wrote a letter to one of his customers explaining that he could not fill his order because his supplier was a Jew.

The text of the letter read as follows:

Montreal 17th April 1775
Sir,
I am favord with your's of the 13th and inconformity I waited on the Israelite, his answer was he had not one bushell belonging to Rachel's maid's Son the Farquesite, and in case the Israelite had wheat, non [sic] of the Sons of Christ, could expect it at present, as it is against the Laws of Moses to do business during the time of the Passover... I remain
Sir
Your most humble
Servt. Richd, Dobie
To:
Mr. Robt. Willcocks.

There was no rabbi, no cantor and no synagogue building. There was barely a minyan, with only 12 Jewish families in the city. Yet here was an unnamed Israelite wholesaler who knew that he was not allowed to deal in or even own chametz, which includes wheat grains, during Passover. He practised his religion without fear of retribution, in the knowledge that his non-Jewish customers respected his faith.

In fact, Jews in Montreal lived in greater freedom than in most other parts of the world. Dobie's unflattering remark pertaining to the wholesaler's illegitimacy reveals his displeasure at the loss of business.

The original of the letter below, bearing Dobbie's fancy monogramed seal, was discovered by historical researcher Eiran Harris at the Jewish Public Library Archives, while he was compiling his bibliography of early Canadian Hebraica.

Raab creating new window art for Beth David

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Toronto artist Ernie Raab, creator of the Holocaust obelisk and the Raoul Wallenberg bust in Earl Bales Park, has shelved his chisels and granite, and taken out paintbrushes and glass.

Raab is busy putting finishing touches to his latest project, an impressive stained glass window in the main sanctuary of Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation, to be unveiled May 5 at 8:15 p.m.

Special guest at the dedication ceremony will be Nobel laureate Elie Wiesel.

Entitled "From Holocaust to Redemption," the work depicts the two seminal events in modern Jewish history: the Holocaust and the creation of the State of Israel. On 32 color-splashed panels, Raab, himself a Holocaust survivor, has incorporated famous photographs of Jewish suffering at the hands of the Nazis, and of Jewish redemption in Israel, into the windows.

Raab's coup-de-grace will be a stained-glass encased aron kodesh, which he says will appear to float in mid-air because of barely-visible supports. Holding the 8x5-foot aron kodesh together will be wood gilded in gold leaf.

The project, estimated to cost about $150,000, comes as the synagogue is in the midst of a $1 million renovation. In addition to the new windows, the main sanctuary is getting a paint job.

Artist Ernie Raab stands before a model of the stained glass windows and the aron kodesh.

Some congregants may notice that the mural that adorned both sides of the bimah is gone, having been painted over. Synagogue officials say the mural, by internationally renowned artist Aba Bayefsky, had faded and suffered damage from moisture over the 20 years it had been displayed. As well, Raab says, the colors in it would have clashed with those in the windows. They assure the mural was photographed and will be recreated, on a smaller scale, elsewhere in the shul.

As for the windows, "we felt it was important to have a permanent reminder of the two most important Jewish events this century," says Beth David's spiritual leader, Rabbi Philip Scheim. "In the not too distant future, there will be no living witnesses remaining."

Rich in Midrashic and other traditional symbols, the windows flow from the fires of the Holocaust upwards to the chalutzim who built Israel, the immigrants who settled it and the soldiers who defended its borders. One panel recreates a photograph of the young Wiesel and his barracksmates in Buchenwald.

Raab is taciturn when it comes to his latest accomplishment. "It was a challenge," he allows.

Reena Foundation to honor Miles Nadal

TORONTO — Miles Nadal, president and CEO of MDC Corp., will be honored by the Reena Foundation at the organization's annual gala dinner, to be held May 27 at the Sheraton Centre.

Nadal turned his hobby of photography, which he learned at Camp Ramah, into a multi-million dollar business. MDC, a publicly-traded, multi-disciplinary communications company, has three divisions: security and specialty printing; direct marketing and home shopping; and communications and marketing services.

Nadal tallies a long list of community involvement, including Mount Sinai Hospital, Baycrest and the Canadian Society for the Weizmann Institute of Science.

Proceeds from the dinner will go toward the completion later this year of the Toby and Henry Battle Developmental Centre in Thornhill. The 45,000-square-foot facility, to be located on Clark Avenue, will serve as a drop-in and day centre for the developmentally handicapped. It will feature programs, a wellness centre, arts workshops, a gym, library, green house and other amenities.

In Nadal's honor, the centre's town hall will be named the Miles and Joanne Nadal Town Hall.

Dinner chair is Lloyd Fogler. Gerald Hartman will serve as event chair, while Bert Raphael will head the tribute committee.

In other Reena news, a grant from UJA Federation of Greater Toronto has enabled Reena and Yachad to join forces for an innovative project.

Yachad, which is affiliated with the National Conference of Synagogue Youth (NCSY), provides programs for developmentally handicapped Jewish youth.

The new joint program hopes to recruit young Jewish volunteers to work with the developmentally handicapped in order to strengthen Jewish values. These programs will include a Shavuot learn-a-thon, a Tu b'Shvat party and other Judaic programming relating to holidays and arts and crafts.

PASSOVER SUPPLIES SENT TO CUBA

These are some of the Passover supplies in a Toronto area warehouse loaded into a ship's container for shipment to Cuba's 1,500-member Jewish community. For more than 30 years, Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, has been raising the necessary funds to purchase and obtain the goods, and transport them to Cuba. Among those who helps organize the shipment through monies collected by the region's Moess Chittin Fund are (from left) Harold Brief, fund chair and Ontario region vice-chair; Jennifer Turack, CJC director of community services and youth activities; Pauline Pont, fund facilitator; and Daniel Fine, CJC director of political liaison and international affairs. Among participants were Koffman-Barenholtz, the supplier who provided the foodstuffs at cost, Mazel Wines for suplying 50 cases of wine at no cost and LEP International, the freight company for providing its services at a reduced cost.

Conference offers participants exercise in mental aerobics

TORONTO — Nearly 300 Jewish Canadian leaders developed dozens of ideas during a recent conference devoted to creative thinking, sponsored by the United Israel Appeal of Canada and the Council of Jewish Federations of Canada.

Among new concepts proposed were intergenerational programs to attract long-time donors and their children, and techniques to ensure that leadership positions are filled by men and women already trained for the job.

"Everybody learned something," said Julia Koschitzky, outgoing chair of the Keren Hayesod Board of Trustees. "It was a great exercise in mental aerobics which many of us have already begun to apply."

Specially trained facilitators filled more than 1,000 flip chart pages with ideas generated by discussions in 25 groups. In the next few weeks the ideas will be reviewed and compiled into one main document.

"The results of the gathering will be far reaching," said Toronto's Carol Kassel, who co-chaired the conference with Barbara and Stanley Plotnick from Montreal. "The techniques used really tapped into all kinds of creativity people didn't even know they had," she said.

"People left on a real high," said Stanley Plotnick, the incoming president of FEDERATION CJA in Montreal. "It was definitely a worthwhile endeavor that will only strengthen the commitment of an already incredibly dedicated group of leaders."

"We were given the ability to look at problems we've been dealing with for years in a whole new light," said Barbara Plotnick. "It was one long brain-storming session."

Avraham Infeld, who heads the Melitz Institute for Jewish Zionist Education, delivered the keynote address which opened the conference. "Jews all around the world are like one big family," said Infeld. "Everyone's contributions are valued and needed."

Lewis, Aurelia Friedlich celebrate 70th anniversary

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Lewis and Aurelia Friedlich met on a boat en route from Vienna to Budapest in July 1926. By the time the five-hour trip was over, Lewis, now 96, had proposed.

It was love at first sight, he told The CJN at the couple's recent 70th anniversary celebration. "She had such a beautiful face."

And those feelings were mutual, said Aurelia, 89. "He was very handsome."

Chaperoned by her brothers, Lewis courted Aurelia in Budapest, where they both lived. They were married on Feb 6, 1927, six months after they met.

The 70th anniversary party took place after the couple returned home from Miami where they winter every year.

Four generations of Friedlichs were on hand for the family celebration which included the presentation of congratulatory plaques from Prime Minister Jean Chrétien and MP Barry Campbell — the Queen will also be sending her greetings — and a slide show of special events in the lives of Lewis and Aurelia's children and their offspring.

The Friedlichs, who have two sons, Tom and Steve, five grandchildren and seven great-grandchildren, find their relationships with their children and grandchildren very gratifying, Lewis said."We enjoy every minute we have them around."

Now that he's home from Florida, Lewis is back at work. He puts in three to four hours a day at his son Steve's office, helping him run an electrical engineering consulting firm. Lewis takes care of bookkeeping and payroll, spending most of his time at the computer.

"Using the computer is my most satisfying occupation," he said. "When we were away for the winter, I was missing it very much."

Aurelia continues in her traditional role as a homemaker, taking care of housekeeping, which includes preparing dinner from scratch every night.

The couple immigrated to Canada in 1949 to escape the Communist regime in Hungary. They suffered considerable hardship from 1939 to 1949, a period of their lives they avoid discussing, Lewis said.

"Talking about it increases my blood pressure."

Lewis was the manager of a lumber conglomerate with headquarters in Budapest. His position entailed foreign travel and when he visited Germany in 1936, he recalled some very disturbing signs of anti-Semitism.

"I was going to our Berlin office on the Kurfurstendamm and the street benches were painted, nicht fur Juden (not for Jews)."

When anti-Semitism spread to Hungary, he lost his position in the company, he said. The family survived the war under the protection of Swedish hero Raoul Wallenberg.

After leaving Hungary, the Friedlichs lived in Saltzberg for nine months waiting to come to Canada. They settled in Toronto, where their son Steve was an engineering student. Tom, their younger son, later studied medicine and became a surgeon.

The Friedlichs' early years in Canada were difficult: money was tight as job opportunities were scarce, Aurelia said. But through a contact in Montreal, Lewis landed a job in a Toronto lumber company.

On the first day, one of Lewis' workers from Hungary recognized him and informed the owner about his former boss's credentials, Lewis said.

"He said, 'Do you know who this man is?'" The owner cancelled Lewis' job and offered him a partnership instead.

Five years later, Lewis became the sole owner. Steve joined the company, running it with his father along with his engineering firm, until 1978 when they sold the lumber business, Lewis said. "Now I work for Steve."

He and Aurelia agreed that their 70-year marriage has been a happy one. And he offered some advice for a successful marriage: "Be considerate, compromise, don't both be stubborn at the same time and don't be extreme."

Kuti Gershoni. Sheer Determination.

'Do you know how I deal with the frustration of my disabilities? I jog myself to exhaustion.' says Kuti Gershoni.

On November 2, 1969, Kuti was summoned to dismantle a mine. As he carefully lowered himself to the ground, there was an earsplitting noise. Kuti felt like he was hit by an express train. Everything was pitch dark ... he could not see or hear ... except for a shrieking sound that filled the air. Both hands were blown off; he was blinded, his hearing was irreparably damaged. Life would never be the same again.

But Kuti is a fighter and was determined not to give up. After extensive surgery he began his rehabilitation at the Beit Halochem Centre in Tel Aviv. Together with the support of his wife and family, he received his Ph.D from Hebrew University. He is now head of Eastern and African Studies at Tel Aviv University. Kuti is currently a visiting Professor at Boston University.

'Society forgets and doesn't know how to deal with the disabled' he says. 'It was only at Beit Halochem that I could go with my family, and together, I could learn to be a whole person again.'

מחשבות לפסח:

"הונאה" - פיליפ רות:

בעניין זה אני רוצה להביא קטע מספרו של הסופר היהודי אמריקני פיליפ רות "הונאה". המספר מתאר שיחה עם אביו הזקן שכועס על כך שאחד מנכדיו (בן אחיו של המספר) עומד להתחתן עם בחורה פורטוריקנית. "אמרתי לאבא: אבא שלך, בתחילת המאה, היו לו שלוש ברירות. אחת-הוא היה יכול להשאר בגליציה היהודית עם סבתא. מה היה קורה? אפר, כולנו! מספר שתיים הוא היה יכול ללכת לפלשתינה. אתה וסאנדי הייתם נלחמים בערבים ב- 1948 וגם אם לא הייתם נהרגים מישהו היה מאבד אצבע, זרוע, רגל. ב- 1967 אני הייתי נלחם במלחמת ששת הימים ולפחות הייתי חוטף קצת שראפנל, נגיד בראש, ומאבד את הראיה בעין אחת. בלבנון שני הנכדים שלך היו נלחמים. טוב, נהיה שמרנים ונניח שרק אחד מהם היה נהרג. זה פלשתינה. הברירה השלישית שלו היתה לבוא לאמריקה. והוא בא. והדבר הכי גרוע שיכול לקרות באמריקה? הנכד שלך מתחתן עם פורטוריקנית. אתה חי בפולין ומקבל את התוצאות של היותך יהודי-פולני, או שאתה חי בישראל ומקבל את התוצאות של היותך יהודי-ישראלי, או שאתה חי באמריקה ומקבל את התוצאות של היותך יהודי-אמריקאי. תגיד לי מה אתה מעדיף." (זמורה-ביתן 1993) אפשר כמובן להתווכח עם הסטטיסטיקות של פיליפ רות לגבי גודל הסיכון המלחמתי בישראל, אבל אין ספק שהדיעה שמובעת פה היא מה שרוב היהודים מרגישים לגבי גודל הסיכון. אז זהו. אם זה בסדר לכם - זה בסדר. אבל אם לא מתאים לכם דברה צ'אנג ואלברט ג'ונסון - כדאי שתתחילו לחשוב על זה מוקדם מספיק.
אשמח לקבל תגובות ואני מבטיח לפרסם אותן.

סיפור חד גדיא:

On Campus

Student anti-Zionism crosses into anti-Semitism

By HERBERT BRILL
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — About three weeks ago, I was interviewed by a reporter from The Newspaper, a University of Toronto weekly. The reporter wanted to know my thoughts about anti-Semitism on campus in light of the recent publication of B'nai Brith's annual report on anti-Semitism.

Opinion

At the time, I described anti-Semitism as being at "a low ebb" and said that most Jewish students at U of T "just don't feel it." I also pointed out that the most serious threats arose from intense anti-Zionism used to cover anti-Semitic feelings. Little did I know at the time that I had had been bang-on in my assessment of the situation.

In the last few weeks, the "low ebb" has risen to a high tide, as anti-Zionist preaching on campus has crossed the line into anti-Semitism. The recent barrage of anti-Israel propaganda by Arab groups, thinly disguising an underlying anti-Jewish sentiment, left many students feeling disillusioned and marginalized.

Recently, the Arab Students Association (ASA) held their annual Arab Awareness Week. The intent is much the same as for the Israel Awareness Week organized by the Jewish Students' Union (JSU). Like the JSU, the ASA set up a pavilion in the student lobby of the Sidney Smith building, a main thoroughfare for U of T students. Each pavilion focused on a particular Arab country's culture and history.

The Palestinian pavilion, however, was quite different. A map of Israel was drawn, with the word "Palestine" scrawled over it. The entire top half of a poster approximately six feet square was given over to describing massacres perpetrated by "Zionists" over the last 50 years. Accompanying the gruesome pictures was commentary, stating that Zionists were very much "like their Nazi counterparts," that "all paratroopers are murderers," that it was Israeli government policy to carry out such massacres. It was only on the bottom half of the poster that one could learn about Palestinian culture and history, though in that also there were political overtones.

Many Jewish students, especially those of Israeli descent, were shocked and dismayed at the display, not because of the pictures themselves — students recognize that dark events occurred during the growth of the State of Israel — but because of the accompanying generalizations, half-truths and lies, and because Palestinian students, instead of taking the opportunity to teach the university community about Palestinian heritage and culture, chose instead to make a political statement. (In contrast, the planners of Israel Day tried to take into account Arab sensitivities. An official map of Israel was not displayed. Rather, a satellite map of the region was used, with no borders marked.)

Offensive display

The shock turned to hurt as the display remained up for a total of three days, even though the authors knew that most Jewish students found the display offensive. As the political action coordinator at the JSU, I felt the display was a blow to my attempts at fostering understanding between Jewish and Palestinian students.

The same Palestinians I had been trying to work with had created the display. When I asked one why I had to bend down to see his culture instead of seeing it at eye level, he brushed me aside, saying that I could never know what it was like to be a Palestinian.

When the display finally was taken down as scheduled, I thought the worst was over. Unfortunately, I was very wrong. The Canada Middle East Information Centre (CMIC), whose mandate is to provide "greater understanding of people in the Middle East," sponsored a talk on Palestine after the Oslo Accords: Are Palestinian Human Rights Being Respected? They invited Paul Findlay, a former U.S. congressman, infamous for his anti-Zionist views. The talk was held in the Medical Science Building Main Auditorium, a hall which seats between 400 and 500 people. From the opening address by a CMIC official, I knew it was not going to be a fun evening.

The official did not once refer to "Israel," only to "Palestine." Findlay then spoke, attributing his removal from office in 1982 to actions taken by the Israel lobby in Washington, and comparing the Israeli occupation to the Holocaust.

When Findlay had finished, the CMIC official introduced a surprise speaker who had not been advertised, a Palestinian named Rafeeb Jabar. Jabar spoke at length about Palestinian torture at the hands of Israelis. While contending that Israel was "built on lies," he insisted that he was anti-Zionist, not anti-Jewish. The true racists, said Jabar, were the Israelis, who think that "any gentile life is worthless." Jabar also called for a new intifadah to secure a Palestinian state, amid loud applause from the mostly Arab crowd.

The hostility of the audience to the few Jews present was palpable. As this auditorium was the same room where I take some of my lectures, dealing with the dichotomy of atmospheres was especially bewildering. When Lance Davis, the program director at the JSU, pointed out to Findlay that the Holocaust was a very singular event in history, he was booed. The question period after the speeches was controlled by the CMIC official. Questioners were not given an opportunity to rebut the one-sided argument presented at the lectern and could only ask short questions. Video cameras also contributed to an intimidating atmosphere.

Sadly, U of T refuses to acknowledge the last few weeks' events as being anything more than normal. Despite numerous calls, campus police refused to investigate the offending poster as being an incitement of hatred against an identifiable group. Student Affairs and the Student Administrative Council (SAC) refuse to take action against the ASA, despite supporting them with financial grants, saying that there are no guidelines for regulating the actions of student groups on campus. Since there are no guidelines for groups which reserve speaking halls on the campus, CMIC can once again book an engagement on university grounds to pursue its own agenda.

The recent events have left Jewish students wondering whether there is any point in trying to get along with Palestinian students on campus. A recent attempt to put together a social planning committee composed of Jewish and Palestinian students has been all but forgotten.

However, I still believe that such incidents could eventually become a thing of the past if we just continue talking. At the CMIC talk, I met a Palestinian student who went out of her way to make me feel more comfortable. After the meeting, I joined a group of Jewish and Palestinian students discussing the Arab-Israeli conflict. We spoke for almost an hour in a polite and honest manner.

The events of the last couple of weeks have overshadowed a year that has been mostly free of anti-Semitism or anti-Zionism. The JSU will continue to press for a censuring of groups that promote anti-Jewish sentiment on campus and we can only hope that the governing councils of the university will finally listen. I have come to the conclusion, however, that good relations between Arabs and Jews on campus can only result from maintaining ties and above all, continuing to talk.

Rally to press for increased war crimes action

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Officials at Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) and the Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre (MHMC) are calling on some 1,000 Montreal Jews to gather for a May 5 noon rally at Place du Canada to protest Ottawa's decades-long foot-dragging on the war crimes issue.

They aim to have the government step up its deportation proceedings against alleged Nazi war criminals living in Canada.

The rally, one day after Yom Hashoah, will coincide with an unprecedented meeting between CJC officials, faith leaders and Justice Minister Allan Rock in Ottawa.

But it's also part of a new national campaign to mobilize the Canadian Jewry grassroots on the war crimes issue.

Similar Jewish community rallies — all under the theme of Nazi War Criminals in Canada One is Too Many! — are being planned for the Yom Hashoah period and during the month of May in the Maritimes, Toronto, Winnipeg, Ottawa and Vancouver.

At the Montreal rally, participants will be given individual postcards to mail to the federal justice minister, while D'Arcy McGee Liberal MNA Lawrence Bergman will be tabling a motion in the National Assembly to speed up federal proceeding against alleged war criminals.

CJC's national officers recently resolved to make such rallies the starting point for continued action.

"We're trying to build on the groundswell of public opinion," said CJC national communications director Mike Cohen. "People wanted a rally and now they're getting one, so they should come!"

"We are providing an arena in which the Canadian public, government, bureaucracies and law enforcement can become fully aware of the serious concern being demonstrated by the community on the issue of Nazi war criminals," said Montreal rally co-chair Myra Giberovitch, who also co-chairs CJC's Holocaust remembrance committee.

'Outing' suspects

The rally in Montreal will feature several speakers including Holocaust survivor Sidney Zoltak of the MHMC; the centre's Sara Weinberg, a daughter of survivors; CJC-Quebec chair Reisa Teitelbaum; rally co-chairs Giberovitch and Rabbi Reuben Poupko; and other prominent clergy members.

The event will also honor Steven Rambam, the U.S. private investigator whose revelations about hundreds of Nazi war criminals still living in Canada proved to be the catalyst for the new Jewish community impetus. (Rambam is planning to move to Israel this year.)

That impetus has included a new policy of publicly "outing" suspected war criminals living in Canada, maintaining a snitch line at CJC for informants and plans to lobby candidates on the war crimes issue prior to the coming federal election.

In Montreal, to signify the rally's importance and the sense of urgency attached to the issue, special funding is being provided by the Jewish Community Foundation of Greater Montreal.

Police raid nabs hate material

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Police in Windsor and Detroit have raided the offices of Resistance Records, one of the largest distributors of white supremacist recordings, T-shirts and other paraphernalia.

The simultaneous raids took place two weeks ago and resulted in the seizure in Detroit of 200,000 CDs and audio cassettes along with business records in Windsor.

Resistance Records is the creation of Canadian George Burdi, who is currently in jail for kicking a woman in the face during a neo-Nazi rampage in Ottawa. Police believe he established the Detroit distribution centre to skirt Canada's anti-hate laws.

U.S. law enforcement officials said they raided the record company's mail order headquarters as part of their investigation of alleged evasion of a six percent tax on the sale of materials. Michigan Det. Sgt. Robert Swackhammer also said Burdi, Jason Snow and Joseph Talic, all Canadians, were operating the company without proper working papers.

Police in Michigan seized 100 boxes of business records, customer address labels and computer mailing records. In Windsor, police seized business records, computers and discs. The raids were conducted at the same time to ensure the safety of officers and to avoid the possible destruction of computer records, said Michigan State Police Det. Sgt. Rodney Young.

The Canadian raid was part of an ongoing hate propaganda investigation by the Ontario Provincial Police.

The raids were welcomed by Jewish organizations, which see hate recordings as one of the most potent tools available to racist groups to recruit young people.

"Hate rock has been since 1994 at the cutting edge of organized anti-Semitism," said Canadian Jewish Congress spokesperson Steven Shulman.

The raids could temporarily put the hate rock enterprise out of business while alerting the public to the gravity of the problem. The fact that the mail order house had a stock of 200,000 CDs and cassettes indicates there is a substantial market for it, Shulman added.

"This operation clearly underlines the need to employ creative methods to stop hatemongers by whatever legal means necessary," stated B'nai Brith spokesperson Frank Dimant.

Shulman pointed out that following a 1993 concert by Burdi's group Ra Ho Wa, which stands for Racial Holy War, a spectator at the concert beat a Tamil dishwasher, leaving him paralyzed. The concert featured songs with violent, racist lyrics like "these boots were made for walking all over Jews," he said.

Federation announces nominees

Sandra Brown, Acting Nominations Committee chairman for the JFGT, has announced the nominees for the board of directors, board of governors and individual representatives to Council.

Elections will be held during the Federation's 22nd annual meeting scheduled for Monday, June 9, 1997 at 7:30 p.m. at the Leah Posluns Theatre, 4588 Bathurst Street.

In accordance with the by-laws, the governance consists of a Council, the president, a Board of Governors, and a Board of Directors. An Executive Committee will be elected by the Board of Directors from amongst the Directors. No nominations can be made from the floor during the annual meeting. However, any member of the Jewish community may be placed in nomination by complying with the following by-laws.

"Only Members of the Federation who have made a financial commitment to the United Jewish Appeal in respect of the previous year, and are in good standing with the United Jewish Appeal, shall be eligible to serve as an individual or Group Representative on the Council.

"Any 20 Representatives may nominate any Individual Member of the Federation for election to the Board of Directors and the position of President, provided that: (a) any one Individual Representative may nominate not more than three nominees for election to the Board of Directors; (b) such nominations shall be in writing and accompanied by the written consent of the nominee; and (c) such nominations shall be delivered to the Federation at least 21 days before the annual meeting of Council.

"Any seven Individual or Group Representatives may nominate any Individual or Group Representative of the Federation for election to the Board of Governors, provided that (a) any one Representative may nominate not more than three nominees for election to the Board of Governors; (b) such nominations shall be in writing and accompanied by the written consent of the nominee; and (c) such nominations shall be delivered to the Federation at least 21 days before the annual meeting of Council.

Quebec minister back from Mideast

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Following his return from the Middle East, Intergovernmental Affairs Minister Sylvain Simard said he hopes Quebec can in a modest way contribute to the peace process.

Simard, accompanied by about 20 representatives of various sectors, recently led a whirlwind six-day mission to Israel, the Palestinian areas and Egypt.

In Jerusalem, he and Israeli Education and Culture Minister Zevulun Hammer signed the first bilateral accord between Quebec and Israel agreeing to cooperate in a wide range of scientific, educational and cultural exchanges.

Simard said the entente is aimed at strengthening links between Quebec and Israel, and he hopes to follow up with an economic mission composed of business and government representatives within a few months. The committee charged with implementing the agreement is scheduled to meet in Quebec in September.

Having a Jewish community of 100,000, Simard believes gives Quebec an "enormous advantage" in establishing contacts with Israel."

The agreement outlines cooperation in science and technology, particularly in pharmaceuticals, biotechnology, the environment and aeronautics; in higher education, notably making it financially easier for Quebec and Israeli students who want to attend universities or research institutes in either country, by waiving the higher foreign student tuition and creating scholarships, for example; and in culture.

Simard was especially pleased by the positive reception from the Israelis and Palestinians to his idea of some kind of three-way cooperation on the management of the region's scarce water resources.

"By working together on common projects, we will doubtless further rapprochement between our societies. In the present context, it's a modest contribution to the Middle East peace process, but it shows, despite the divergence of view, a real will by each to live in harmony with their neighbors."

Simard has been to Israel before. A few years ago, he was a participant in a Canada-Israel Committee trip, led by Thomas Hecht, for prominent francophone Quebecers. Simard was then president of the Mouvement National des Québécois and a University of Ottawa professor.

In general, Simard found a "cautious optimism" about the peace process among the Israelis, Palestinians and Egyptians whom he met. He perceived "a deep conviction that this process is irreversible and that one day, not long off, I hope, peace will return."

During his two days In Israel, Simard also met with Environment and Agriculture Minister Rafael Eitan, as well as officials of the ministries of Foreign Affairs and Industry and Commerce.

They placed a wreath at the tomb of Yitzhak Rabin and visited the Yad Vashem Holocaust memorial. Simard had breakfast with Canadian Ambassador David Berger and toured the company Jerusalem Software Incubator.

Of personal interest to Simard was a meeting with the Association démocratique des Français d'Israël. Simard noted that 15 to 20 percent of Israelis are French-speaking and he would like to assist an effort to include Israel in La Francophonie, which is one of his ministerial responsibilities.

Simard went on to Ramallah, where he met with Nabil Shaath, the Palestinian minister of Planning and International Cooperation.

In Cairo, Simard signed an agreement for cooperation in such areas as water management, educational reform and public administration, and confirmed plans for an official Egyptian mission to Quebec.

Police arrest Haredim at Sabbath protest

Demonstrators throw stones, block traffic

By ELLI WOHLGELERNTER
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Twenty-four people were arrested and nine police officers were injured last Saturday on Rehov Bar Ilan in Jerusalem, as 5,000 Haredim gathered there in the afternoon and threw stones and empty bottles in another demonstration to press for the closure of the thoroughfare on Shabbat.

Police said 20 of the arrested were suspected of assaulting police officers and trying to close down the road, while the other four were taken in after rolling a garbage can into the middle of the road.

The demonstration followed a weekend of protest, beginning last Friday night, when three nurses who work in an old-age home near Rehov Bar Ilan were assaulted by Haredim and had to be rescued by police.

Police estimated that 1,000 to 1,500 people were involved the usual chanting of "Shabbes, Shabbes" at passing motorists, and an attempt to march in the street to block traffic.

Israeli police restrain demonstrators attempting to close a Bar-Ilan street in Jerusalem after the Israeli High Court ruled that it should remain open on the Sabbath. [Reuter/RNS photo]

Hundreds of police deployed throughout the day, including reinforcements from outside the city, prevented the street's closing. One passing car was stoned, but there was little traffic overall during the day.

The weekend disturbances were in response to the High Court of Justice ruling of the previous week, which said that the plan by Transportation Minister Yitzhak Levy to close the street was unworkable as constituted, but the road could be closed if arrangements were made for the secular residents of the area.

While many saw the decision to mean that the street would eventually be closed to traffic, the feeling among Haredim was that the demonstrations should continue until the street is actually closed.

Ornan Yekutieli, Meretz city councilman and leader of the fight for secular rights, called on all secular residents of Jerusalem to ride next Shabbat along Rehov Bar Ilan to strengthen the police and ensure the High Court's decision would be enforced.

Jerusalem police chief Yair Yitzhaki said that more efforts would be made this week to calm tensions over the issue, before the next decision by Levy was issued. Yitzhaki said that if there was a deterioration in the situation, and the demonstrations became more violent, he would not hesitate to use horses and water cannons to keep the situation under control.

BUENOS AIRES — Local Jewish leaders are reacting with skepticism to an Argentine government decision to create an independent commission to investigate claims that looted Nazi gold was secretly transferred to the country during and after World War II.

The announcement to form the panel was made last week by Interior Minister Carlos Corach, who said that Argentine President Carlos Menem "will invite relevant figures from Argentina and abroad" to join the commission, which will have a year to deliver its findings.

According to American researchers, Argentine banks figured prominently in a Nazi-sponsored scheme to launder money and smuggle looted gold into Argentina during the war years.

In a recently declassified memo dated April 1945, the U.S. Embassy in Buenos Aires estimated at the time Nazi assets in the country were worth more than $1 billion (US).

Last year, Argentina's central bank turned over five volumes of financial records to the local office of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre.

But, according to Jewish researchers, that was the last time the government cooperated in their efforts to probe Argentina's wartime past.

Three months ago, Sergio Widder, the Latin American representative of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre, asked that Argentine officials track information about 334 Nazi officials and businessmen who may have transferred Nazi gold to local banks during and after the war.

After placing what he described as "endless calls," Widder was granted an interview with government officials, who gave him a list of the banks operating in Argentina during the 1940s.

In an interview, Widder described this list as "perfectly useless information."

Widder added that he remained skeptical about what the newly formed commission would find.

By contrast, Ruben Beraja, the president of the Argentine Jewish umbrella organization DAIA, voiced his support for the commission.

Beraja said in an interview that he had been invited to join in the commission and that he was "considering the idea."

A source within the Jewish community was as skeptical as Widder, saying that "no miracles should be expected.

"The only way to find the truth is to investigate private banks, and no commission can do that.

Netanyahu, coalition facing new challenges

[Cont'd from page 1]

The allegations, first raised in an Israel Television report, suggested that Deri, a member of Netanyahu's coalition, had pushed for Bar-On's appointment in the hope of getting a plea bargain in his own ongoing corruption trial.

In the aftermath of the decision by the attorney general, questions lingered about the viability of the fragile 9-month-old coalition led by Netanyahu.

The immediate danger facing Netanyahu is possible erosion of support within his cabinet over the Bar-On affair.

Netanyahu admitted in a CNN interview last Sunday that he "could not guarantee" that every one of his ministers would stick with him. However, he declared that the parties comprising the coalition were "solid" and the government would endure.

Two key coalition parties, Yisrael b'Aliyah and the Third Way, were still deciding how to respond to the attorney general's report.

Yisrael b'Aliyah leader Natan Sharansky was burdened by a statement he made when the allegations surrounding the appointment of Bar-On were first aired on Israel television three months ago: "If only 10 percent of them are true — this government must go," he said.

Yehuda Harel, leader of the Third Way, said last Sunday that the attorney general's report was "very far from an exoneration of the prime minister."

If either of these parties decides to bolt from the coalition, the prime minister would be forced to call new elections, both for prime minister and for the Knesset.

Netanyahu could face dissention from yet another coalition partner, the haredi Shas party, which holds 10 Knesset seats. The fact that only Deri is to be indicted in connection with the Bar-On affair was causing enormous resentment in Shas, and party spokespersons called for mass demonstrations.

If, however, these three parties remain in the government, Netanyahu can be confident of weathering the possible defections of one or more of his own Likud party colleagues.

At least two Likud cabinet members, Finance Minister Dan Meridor and Communications Minister Limor Livnat, were assessing their own personal futures early this week. Both have expressed reservations about Netanyahu's style of governance.

In any event, Netanyahu could make a quick cabinet reshuffle, including removing Hanegbi, who was closely associated with Bar-On, and perhaps bring in some new faces. Netanyahu promised to appoint a cabinet committee that would carefully weigh future appointments such as attorney general.

An alternative scenario for the government's future envisions Yisrael b'Aliyah and the Third Way joining forces with the Labor party in a special Knesset vote to remove the prime minister, which requires a majority of 80 out of the 120 parliament members.

In that event, the Knesset would not dissolve and a new election would be held only for prime minister.

What steps might be taken in the Knesset were likely to await High Court of Justice action on petitions by Labor Knesset member Yossi Beilin and Meretz leader Yossi Sarid, who were appealing to the court to overturn the attorney general's decision not to implement the police recommendation to indict the prime minister.

However, most legal experts in Jerusalem agreed with the premier that the chances of the High Court reversing the attorney general's decision are slender at best.

As the domestic political maneuvering continues, Netanyahu can be expected to step up diplomatic moves on the stalled peace process and to seek to enhance the image of business as usual.

"We've got a lot a work ahead of us," he kept telling a CNN interviewer and his tens of millions of viewers, determined to create an image of a back-to-normal administration.

But the prospect of continuing domestic political instability in the weeks ahead does not augur well for efforts to get the Israeli-Palestinian peace process back on track.

With his coalition now shakier than ever, he will be more dependent on its hard-line elements, the National Religious Party and the right wing of Likud.

These elements almost rebelled over the Hebron accord in January and over the scale of Netanyahu's proposal to transfer nine percent of rural West Bank land to the Palestinian Authority in the first of three further redeployments.

OBITUARY

ISIDORE C. (ZEKE) POLLACK, C.M., Q.C.

Isidore C. (Zeke) Pollack, C.M., Q.C., died April 10, 1997 at the age of 83.

Zeke Pollack was born in Quebec City in 1913, son of Maurice and Rifka (Tarantour) and received his B.A. with honours in Economics and Political Science at McGill University and his L.L.L. at Laval University in Quebec City.

Devoted husband to Roselee Hart, formerly of Hartford, Connecticut; beloved father of Adelle-Laudrey (Bryon Rowell) in Florida and Jon Hart (Kimberley Stewart) in Toronto and cherished grandfather of Joshua and Ian. Mr. Pollack will also be dearly missed by his sister Florence Pedvis (Dr. Sydney) in Montreal and brothers Sam in Montreal and Charles (Constance Coane) in Philadelphia.

The career highlights of Mr. Pollack include: partner in law firm "Angers, Caisse and Pollack", Montreal 1938-39; Served in the military, 1939-46; Commander, Royal Canadian Navy, R.C.N.V.R., 1943; Member of the Canadian Naval Mission in London, England, 1945; Joined the Department of External Affairs, Legal Division, 1947; Appointed Secretary General of Canada of the United Nations, 1950. Mr. Pollack resigned from government service in 1951 to become President and Chief Executive Officer of "M. Pollack Ltd." in Quebec; returned to the practice of law as a member of "Létourneau, Stein, Marseille, Larue and Delisle", 1969-77; Chairman of the Ministry of Transport Task Force to develop new "Ports of Policy for Canada", 1976-77; Appointed Counsel of the law firm of "Langlois, Drouin and Associates", 1979.

Mr. Pollack served as Chairman, Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council; Director, Trizec Montreal; Director, Hilton International Hotel, Quebec City; Member, le Conseil de l'Université Laval; Member of the Board of Governors, Weizmann Institute of Science, Rehovot, Israel. He was one of the founders of the Canadian Society for the Weizmann Institute of Science and was honoured in Montreal by the Weizmann Institute of Science in 1988. Mr. Pollack also served as Vice-President, Quebec Superior Council of Tourism; President, Travel Industry Association of Canada; Chairman, Port Authority; President, Chamber of Commerce and Industry of Metropolitan Quebec; President, Laval University Foundation.

Mr. Pollack was also active as Director, World Wildlife Fund (Canada), and in the Arts; Trustee, National Gallery of Ottawa; Director, National Youth Orchestra of Canada; Director, National Ballet of Canada; President, Quebec Symphony Orchestra; Counsel to the President of Geoffrion, Leclerc; as well as President, National Design Council (Ottawa).

Among the many award and appointments Mr. Pollack received were: "Médaille des Anciens de l'Université Laval, Gloire d'Escolle", 1974; Appointed a Member of the Order of Canada, 1976; Appointed Queen's Counsel, 1976.

A funeral service was held on Sunday, April 13, 1997 at Temple Israel in West Palm Beach, Florida. In lieu of flowers, contributions may be made to Canadian Society for the Weizmann Institute of Science or the Alzheimer Society of Canada.

Herzog remembered as 'voice of peace'

Limor also recalled a later visit to Auschwitz where Herzog had wept openly.

Herzog's broad interests and multifaceted background were valuable tools in helping him carry out the responsibilities of his office, Limor said. "They enhanced his sensitivity towards other people."

Herzog was the only president, he added, who had had to deal with six governments and four heads of government.

In Toronto, Israel's consulate and national Jewish organizations issued the following statements on news of Herzog's death:

"The Consulate General in Toronto, on behalf of the president and the government of the State of Israel, regrets to announce with deep sorrow, the passing of the sixth president of the State of Israel, Mr. Chaim Herzog.

"A condolence register [was open] in the offices of the Consulate General on Monday, April 21, from 10 a.m. to 2 p.m."

B'nai Brith Canada president Lyle Smordin hailed Herzog as "a scholar, a leader and a voice of peace. Mr. Herzog was part of a very special generation of heroes who devoted their lives to the establishment and sustainment of the State of Israel. May his memory be for a blessing."

In a letter to Israel's ambassador to Canada, David Sultan, Canadian Jewish Congress president Goldie Hershon said Herzog was "a great leader, a man of many talents who represented Israel and the Jewish people at home and abroad. He will always be remembered for his eloquence and strong advocacy as Israel's ambassador to the United Nations.

"His life was a panorama of many careers and he left his imprint as a lawyer, politician, military leader, writer and statesman. The Jewish community has lost one of its giants and the void will be felt."

Stephen Victor, national chair of the Canada-Israel Committee, said Herzog "will always be remembered not only as an outstanding statesman but also as a soldier, military strategist, diplomat and author...

"President Herzog's career spanned more than half a century, during which time he helped steer Israel through its periods of crises and participated in its moments of triumph. He will be sorely missed by all those who benefitted from his wisdom and leadership."

At the graveside on Mount Herzl, Herzog was eulogized by Weizman, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, Labor leader Shimon Peres, Ashkenazi Chief Rabbi Yisrael Meir Lau, his second son, Col. Michael Herzog, and his third son, Isaac Herzog.

All of them listed his many attributes, yet each had something different to say. Weizman spoke of his valuable contribution in building the IDF. As a former intelligence officer in the British army, Herzog had much to give. "The young army needed all his knowledge and experience."

No one personified statesmanship more than Herzog, said Netanyahu, who called him "the beautiful Israeli" and noted that Herzog "always saw himself as the envoy of the nation."

There was no one more suitable than Herzog, Netanyahu emphasized, to stand at the head of the nation's 50th anniversary celebrations, which was why he had appointed him. Even though he will not be there, Netanyahu concluded, "we will continue in his spirit." The first meeting of the 50th anniversary committee had been scheduled for April 17, the day Herzog died.

The Week in Israel

April 14

• Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu may be seeking a compromise on the Har Choma issue. He is suggesting that construction of the first buildings could be delayed until the year 2000, after the scheduled completion of final-status talks with the Palestinians.

• The Israeli restaurateur who employed the suicide bomber who carried out last month's attack at a Tel Aviv cafe was given a five-month suspended jail sentence and fined for employing Palestinians without proper permits.

April 15

• An IDF unit in the southern Lebanon security zone killed three Hezbollah gunmen and wounded several others. No Israeli troops were injured.

April 16

• Israel sealed off the West Bank in response to reports of a possible terrorist attack.

• Israel's chief rabbis and the Ministry of Absorption have agreed that Israelis who are not recognized as Jewish by the Orthodox rabbinate will be buried in separate sections of existing Jewish cemeteries.

April 17

• An inquiry into the Feb.4 helicopter crash that killed 73 Israeli soldiers recommended the dismissal of two officers for alleged negligence that led to the tragedy. The commission did not conclusively determine what caused the two helicopters to collide while they were in a holding pattern over northern Israel.

• Israeli security forces defused a 20-pound bomb found near the home of a Hamas terrorist in the village of Tsurif, near Hebron. The discovery came as Israel continued a total closure on the West Bank.

April 20

• The IDF denied rumors that it launched a commando raid into Iran to rescue missing Israeli airman Ron Arad. Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai said he had no idea of the source of the rumors but denied that any rescue attempt had been made. Arad's plane was shot down over Lebanon in 1986.

Israel's religious wars

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mideast Analysis

Benjamin Netanyahu put it best. "I would say that it's probably easier to make peace with the Palestinians than to resolve this issue satisfactorily," he said, referring to a controversial bill before the Knesset that would invalidate conversions to Judaism performed by non-Orthodox rabbis in Israel.

Even if Netanyahu's statement is dismissed as hyperbole, the fact of the matter is that religious issues are creating deep fissures and a troubling sense of disunity in Israeli society, at a time when peace negotiations with the Palestinians are in a real state of crisis.

These divisions have widened the gap between secular and Orthodox Jews, thereby raising tensions to an uncomfortable level. Recent surveys confirm this. Nearly 50 percent of non-observant Israeli Jews have negative feelings about their religious counterparts, while 35 percent of Israelis predict that a civil war, a kulturkampf, will eventually convulse the country.

In a related development which hardly bodes well for the political and psychological health of the nation, there has been an upsurge of mutual animosity between the national religious camp, which opposes the Oslo peace process, and the secular liberal/moderate camp, which wants it to succeed.

The conversion bill, which has passed the first of three readings, is a flashpoint in the continuing battle for Israel's soul and character.

In a week when Reform and Conservative rabbis were warning Netanyahu that passage of the conversion bill would be "a tragedy" for Israel and the Diaspora, the Israeli Supreme Court ruled that Bar-Ilan Street — a thoroughfare in Jerusalem which cuts through a haredi neighborhood — should remain open on the Sabbath until the government can resolve the question.

Politics exacerbates the Bar-Ilan dispute. The three religious parties in Netanyahu's shaky coalition, which hold a total of 23 Knesset seats, were promised that Bar-Ilan Street would be closed. If it is not, they can theoretically bring down his government, which was buffeted last week by the burgeoning Bar-On influence peddling scandal.

Due to Israel's electoral system, every prime minister since 1948 has been more or less beholden to the religious bloc. David Ben-Gurion, the first premier, granted the Orthodox rabbinate a wide range of powers in matters such as marriage and conversion. In exchange, the religious parties of the day agreed to support his government.

Popularly known as the status quo, this arrangement has never functioned smoothly. The vast majority of Israeli Jews do not subscribe to Orthodox strictures and, therefore, resent efforts to force their values on them.

The datim, in turn, have worked assiduously to expand the boundaries of the status quo, having imposed a ban on El Al Sabbath flights and on the sale of pork. In addition, they have railed against autopsies and launched campaigns to stop archeological digs and the opening of movie theatres on the Sabbath.

With masses of Soviet immigrants pouring into Israel from the late 1980s onward, the religious parties seized on the "Who is a Jew" issue, further roiling the waters.

But for all the influence they have exerted, the datim have not had the field to themselves. Responding to cases filed by secular Jews in recent years, the Supreme Court issued a series of historic decisions which liberalized the status quo. This prompted the Orthodox lobby to push for more restrictive rules governing Sabbath closings and conversions.

The current struggle over the interpretation of the status quo revolves around the pending conversion bill, which, if passed, would most affect olim from the former Soviet Union.

Netanyahu claims that the proposed legislation would merely formalize the status quo, but opponents disagree, calling it an example of religious coercion which distorts the essence of Judaism and mocks the ideals of freedom and liberty.

Helicopter crash inquiry urges disciplinary action

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — A commission of inquiry into the Feb. 4 helicopter crash that killed 73 Israeli soldiers has recommended the dismissal of two officers and reprimands against two others for alleged negligence that led to what was Israel's worst air disaster.

The commission did not conclusively determine what caused the two helicopters to collide while they were flying over northern Israel awaiting permission to enter southern Lebanon.

"Unfortunately, the truth was taken by the victims of the crash to their graves," said David Ivry, a former air force commander who headed the commission.

The commission submitted its findings last week to Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai, who said he would adopt all the recommendations.

The commission determined that both pilots were in good health and were not suffering from any condition that could impair their ability to fly their aircraft.

The panel also said that it did not appear that an external technical problem, such as an onboard explosion or the use of a cellular phone, had disrupted the helicopters' flights.

The commission found serious flaws in air force procedures, including a lack of coordination between flights. These formed the basis for the disciplinary measures, but the commission did not link them directly to the cause of the crash.

The commission recommended that the commander of the Tel Nof air base, where the helicopters were stationed, be reprimanded by the Israel Defence Force chief of staff.

The squadron commander was dismissed, and barred from taking any future command positions in the air force, for telling the commission that there was no need for the two helicopters to have flown in formation, and for his disclosure that there were separate procedures between the two helicopters regarding turning off lights before crossing the border.

The commission recommended a reprimand for the deputy commander of the squadron who briefed the two pilots before their mission.

And it recommended that a ground forces officer in charge of the Machanayim air base, from which the helicopters took off, be dismissed and barred from serving in any command positions for three years.

Despite efforts to piece together the events preceding the crash, including a high-tech simulation conducted with the aid of NASA scientists, members of the commission said they could not conclusively determine what caused the helicopters' fiery collision.

It was known that the two helicopters, which were flying troops to positions in southern Lebanon, had entered a holding pattern on the Israeli side of the border before receiving permission to cross into Lebanon.

One of the helicopters had turned off its lights, as is procedure before crossing.

The second helicopter struck the first. Both went down over the northern Israeli agricultural community of Sha'ar Yishuv.

No one on the ground was hurt, but there were no survivors from the two helicopters.

In order to prevent future accidents, the commission recommended that the number of flights per pilot be reduced; that all helicopters be equipped with "black boxes" to record cockpit data and conversations; that clear procedures be established regarding the turning off of lights when crossing borders; that a lead helicopter be established when two fly together; that squadrons operate under the same procedures; and that helicopters fly alone during any night flights into southern Lebanon.

The parents of one of the soldier's killed in the crash, Yoram and Lior Alper, called on Air Force commander Maj. Gen. Eitan Ben-Eliahu to resign.

The Alpers accused Ben-Eliahu of running a public relations campaign to cover up his personal responsibility for the matter.

"The question is, 'Where was the air force commander during all this?'" said Lior Alper.

"It's too bad we had to lose our son to reach the conclusion that the air force did not function as it should have," she said.

Fatal school trip broke Education Ministry policy

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM – A committee investigating last month's shooting deaths of seven Israeli schoolgirls by a Jordanian soldier has recommended that the head of the Education Ministry's security division be dismissed.

A Jordanian soldier opened fire March 13 on a group of Beit Shemesh students on a field trip to a border site, Naharayim, called "The Island of Peace."

The island was transferred to Jordan under the 1994 peace treaty, but the area, a popular tourist destination, is farmed by Israelis.

The committee, headed by Reserve Brig. Gen. Yigal Pressler, concluded that the Education Ministry's top security official had failed in carrying out his duties.

Pressler, a former anti-terror adviser to the prime minister, said that while thousands of students had visited Naharayim since Israel and Jordan signed the peace treaty, Education Ministry policy barred school trips there.

The committee said that the head of the ministry's security division, Shlomo Tzudkavitz, should have implemented that policy.

The committee further recommended an administrative reprimand to Moshe Yablovitz, the principal of the Beit Shemesh school.

Education Minister Zevulun Hammer said he would adopt the recommendations of the committee.

Contest to mark Zionism's 100th

RAMAT GAN, ISRAEL — Bar-Ilan University and the Israeli Ministry of Education have launched an international study competition on Jewish identity for students in Israel and the Diaspora to mark the 100th anniversary of the first Zionist Congress.

The competition will cover topics such as Jewish identity and holidays, Jewish brotherhood and historical themes related to "100 years of Zionism." It is open to Jewish youth aged 11-16 from Israel and the Diaspora. Bar-Ilan University and the education Ministry are providing study material on which contenders will be tested in their individual schools.

On Jerusalem Day in May, participating countries will hold national competitions featuring winning representatives from each of its schools. Israeli Minister of education, Zevulun Hammer, and Bar- Ilan University president, Prof. Moshe Kaveh, will host the international finals on June 24, in Basel, Switzerland. Participants in the Basel finals will travel to Israel for an educational seminar at the university during the last week of June. The three top winners will receive a scholarship for a first year study at Bar-Ilan University. Runners-up will receive selected books.

Principals and teachers who wish to receive additional information and/or register their schools may contact: Israel Ministry of Education, Tel: 972-3-693-5063 or 972-3-693-5064, Fax: 972-3-693-5076.

Educator discusses seders

NEW YORK — The seder is a paradigm of modern educational thinking, according to Carol Ingall, assistant professor of Jewish education at the William Davidson Graduate School of Jewish Education at the Jewish Theological Seminary in New York.

The hot new premises in general education, she says, are that communal learning is the most effective form of learning; that learners learn by doing; that curiosity leads to questions, and questions lead to learning; that the best teaching appeals to diverse learning styles and that educational experiences are heightened when learners wrestle with the question "What does it mean to me?"

All these aspects are present in the seder, says Ingall. Both today's teaching theories and the seder create learning environments that appeal to all the senses. Both rely on the use of questions to build on the learner's natural curiosity. They both lead learners from the concrete to the abstract, from a reflection of the here and now to glimpses of the past and future. They are inherently social, echoing the long-established rabbinic belief that the best learning takes place within a community.

"The seder is a family ceremony that blends provocative ritual, unusual foods, age-old questions and answers tailor-made for different learning styles to involve its participants in a colossal narrative of rescue and redemption.

"Its genius is while the rites, the questions and the story never change, each individual in each generation is swept up in this epic theatre, constructing his or her own meaning. In each generation, every individual should feel as though he or she had actually been redeemed from Egypt – progressive education at its finest," Ingall asserts.

Stress seen as inevitable part of human condition

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Stress is not necessarily a negative experience but an inevitable part of the human condition, a packed auditorium at Mount Sinai Hospital Women's Auxiliary's recent annual health education lecture was told.

Dr. Allan Peterkin, a psychiatrist at the hospital's Department of Psychiatry and Family and Community Medicine, defined it as "a physiological and emotional response to change. By nature it is neutral," either positive, such as the birth of a child, or negative, such as a job loss or a death.

Its effect, he said, is "mediated by personality, coping skills and the amount of support one has."

Flexibility, a sense of humor, optimism, and the ability to actively seek a balance between work and the home and between the physical and the spiritual all help give a person a feeling of control over a situation, he said.

Holocaust survivors, for instance, Peterkin said, differed in how they handled their experiences. "While they all experienced the horrors, some felt some sense of control, at least for one day at a time, while others gave up. It proves that you matter in a situation."

When a person reaches the point at which coping strategies don't work ("that might be when illness comes on top of other stresses"), burnout occurs.

"Burnout is the unsuccessful response to repeated stress, characterized by emotional exhaustion, and despair," Peterkin said.

Symptoms of burnout include fatigue, frequent illness, lack of concentration, fluctuating weight and carelessness, he said. People might miss work or school, become addicted to such substances as caffeine, alcohol or tranquilizers, have mood swings and show less creativity and initiative and more irritability.

This can be seen in hospitals and organizations in the current climate of uncertainty, he said, where one finds hostility, extreme competitiveness and a lack of trust.

People know when they are not coping well, Peterkin said, and need to seek help from, for instance, a counsellor, or holistic therapies.

He offered these "rules for coping: "Don't sweat the small stuff, it's all small stuff and if you can't fight, flee — it may not be worth fighting for."

Kailee Kline, founder and president of Health Winds, a health and wellness spa, noted that since the advent of e-mail and voice mail, "there is no point at which we are not accessible or available."

This is an especially bad time for women, she said, who operate on the new philosophy of "eat on the run, drink when you are parched, and sleep when you drop."

She said, "We have to recognize that we are a complete package – the body, the mind, creative capacity, emotions and spirituality," and one must learn to listen to all those aspects, understand how they work and develop new skills to deal with assaults on them.

Exercise is very useful, Kline said, it "alters hormones, lowers blood pressure and relaxes the nervous system."

Toronto Sun columnist Linda Barnard, noting that "laughter has undeniable stress reduction properties," treated the audience to a series of hilarious anecdotes about the stresses of journalism.

Educating teens on safe sex

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Educating teenagers about safe sex is a life-saving measure, says one of Canada's foremost journalists and social activists.

Noting that women are more vulnerable to AIDS than men, June Callwood suggested that condom-dispensing machines be placed in the girls' washrooms in high schools to help young women protect themselves.

"You're not encouraging sex," she said. "You're saying, 'Do not die, my child.'"

Callwood, founder of Casey House, an AIDS hospice, was one of five guests speakers at an AIDS awareness evening held recently at the Beth Tikvah Synagogue. The other speakers were: Rabbi Philip Sheim of Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation; Louise Binder, an AIDS activist and lawyer; Jim Donovan, a nurse at Casey House Hospice; and Edwin Scherer, a volunteer with AIDS patients.

Callwood said Casey House was established nine years ago to give people with AIDS a comfortable place to be treated because they were isolated in hospitals when the disease first manifested itself in the early '80s.

Hospital staff tended to be abusive and insensitive to AIDS patients out of ignorance, she said.

She told of an incident where a clergy member summoned by a hospital to administer last rites to an AIDS patient came wearing gloves, a gown, a mask and heavy boots because he thought he could be infected.

She described Casey House as a place that offers affection and mutual support. "People get great satisfaction from making our residents comfortable."

Binder also stressed the importance of safe sex, using her own situation as an example: she unknowingly contracted AIDS from her second husband.

"Everybody can get AIDS. It doesn't matter what your sexual orientation is," she warned. "Everybody has had a life before. We don't know everything about people."

In the four years since she was diagnosed with HIV, her illness has always been at the forefront of her thoughts, she said. "I never stop thinking about it for one moment, even when I sleep."

Chair of the Voice of Positive Women and a volunteer at the HIV legal clinic, Binder has become a leading AIDS activist. She expressed disappointment with the Chrétien government for "doing absolutely nothing to the fight against this disease."

Asked about the Toronto Jewish community's response to people with AIDS, Binder said she has found the Reform synagogues very helpful and sympathetic, but there has been far less support from the Conservative and Orthodox congregations.

Rabbi Sheim said in keeping with the teachings in the Talmud, it is incumbent upon all Jews, regardless of their affiliation, to be supportive of people afflicted with AIDS.

"We have to welcome these people who suffer and make them part of the synagogue... We have to be there for those who need us."

Scherer, a youth counsellor who has been volunteering with AIDS patients since 1983, said he has learned to deal with multiple losses in this work, which can be very stressful, but he also derives tremendous gratification from the intimate and intense relationships he forms with people in the terminal phase of the illness.

Baycrest awarded full accreditation

TORONTO — Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care has been awarded full accreditation status from the Canadian Council of Health Services Accreditation (CCHSA) for consistent delivery of excellent care to older adults and their families.

The CCHSA is a non-profit national organization that sets standards for health-care facilities across the country and regularly evaluates their compliance.

A team from CCHSA visited Baycrest in December for four days of interviews with staff and clients to evaluate the quality of care and services.

In summarizing Baycrest's achievements, the council stated: "Baycrest truly is a forward thinking organization, with a strong emphasis on such areas as education, research, advanced technology.... This emphasis, as well as establishing new and existing health care programs through creative linkages and partnerships, has allowed the organization to maintain its leadership role as a centre of excellence in geriatric health care."

Film recounts 1947 voyage of the Exodus

Sheldon Kirshner reviews three films to be shown at the Toronto Jewish Film Festival, running from May 1-8 at the Bloor Cinema.

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Forget Otto Preminger's 1960 melodrama Exodus when the documentary Exodus 1947 (May 5) lights up the screen.

Preminger's unwieldy three-hour epic purportedly told the story of a refugee ship which caused an international sensation and, metaphorically, helped launch a nation. In fact, though, Exodus was an uneasy amalgam of fact and fiction.

Exodus 1947, by contrast, comes much closer to the truth, and is no less dramatic. This 60-minute film, directed by Elizabeth Rodgers and Robby Henson, is based on archival and newsreel footage and interviews with protagonists from both sides of the divide.

In 1947, Palestine — a British mandate — was seething with turmoil. Fighting, pitting Jews against Arabs, had broken out, and a fullscale Arab invasion was a year away.

Britain, exhausted by World War II, found itself in the middle of the strife. But, in keeping with its 1939 White Paper, Britain imposed a naval blockade on Palestine in order to limit the number of Jewish refugees, mainly Holocaust survivors, streaming into the country.

The provisional Jewish government would have no truck with Britain's policy and responded with the Aliyah Bet campaign, the purpose of which was to bring 120,000 illegal immigrants to Palestine by sea. The Exodus 1947, originally known as the President Warfield, was one of 64 Haganah-chartered ships which tried to break the blockade. With 5,554 passengers, it was also the largest.

Exodus 1947 fills in the historical background, weaving a fascinating tale about the famous ship's origins, the motivations of its American crew, its perilous voyage and its significance to Israel's birth.

The President Warfield was a U.S. luxury liner, plying the route from Baltimore to Norfolk in Chesapeake Bay. It participated in the 1944 Normandy invasion, was bought by the Haganah for $40,000 and was subsequently refitted with funds raised by the American Jewish community.

Primarily Jews with little seafaring experience, the crew members were drawn to the mission by idealism, adventure, Zionism and a revulsion to the Holocaust. All were sworn in as Haganah recruits.

Registered as a Honduran vessel, and supposedly bound for Hong Kong, the President Warfield set out from Baltimore in February 1947, but a storm forced it back to port. Steaming out again, it made for the Azores and then Marseilles to take on passengers.

On July 17, the ship, having been renamed Exodus 1947, raised the Magen David and charted a course for Palestine, intending to offload its passengers on a beach at Bat Yam.

Twenty five miles off the coast of Gaza, the Exodus 1947 ran into a flotilla of British ships. Refusing to stop, the Exodus 1947 was rammed, then boarded by sailors and marines. "We gave them a hell of a fight," recalls a crew member. In the scuffle, three persons were killed and 146 injured.

Being no match for the British, the Exodus 1947 surrendered. In Haifa, the refugees and crew were forced into three prison ships heading for France. The refugees refused to disembark, whereupon the British, in a disastrous fit of petulance, sent them to Germany, of all places.

As a result of this incident, world opinion turned against Britain. Several months later, the United Nations passed a resolution partitioning Palestine, a decision which paved the way for the establishment of Israel.

The filmmakers exaggerate the Exodus 1947's role in Israel's creation, but there is no doubt that the ship — which caught fire and sank in Haifa in 1952 — stirred sympathy for the Zionist cause.

The Italians are Coming (May 1 and May 2) is a bitter-sweet confection from Israel which unfolds in Hebrew, English and Italian.

The 90-minute film basically turns on the friendship between an idealistic Italian water polo coach and his former Israeli Olympic rival. The relationship momentarily sours when a beautiful woman enters the scene.

Luigi (Franco Nero), the Italian, brings his team to a kibbutz for training. His host is Amos (Asher Tsarfati), whose water polo team is on a losing streak and in dire danger of being disbanded by a kibbutz on the cusp of bankruptcy.

Luigi's rosy visions of the kibbutz do not correspond with reality, and his players are none too satisfied with the boarding arrangements or the food.

Worse still, Luigi alienates Amos when he and Daria (Yona Eilan-Keshet), Amos' ex-flame and the manager of the shoe factory, develop more than just a passing acquaintanship.

The Italians are Coming has its moments, and its subtle, sometimes sardonic portrayal of the changing nature of kibbutz life is instructive. But there is almost no chemistry between Nero and Eilan-Keshet, even though both are physically attractive, and director Eyal Halfon has something to learn about pacing.

Be that as it may, The Italians are Coming is relatively compelling.

As Tears Go By (May 4 and May 8), written and directed by Eitan Green, is one of the weakest Israeli films I have seen in a long while.

The plot revolves around Ya'acov (Arie Moskona), a hard-driving Tel Aviv businessman, and his son Yitzhak (Avi Graynik), a nervous wreck who still hasn't passed his driving test after eight desperate attempts.

Green throws two heart attacks and a couple of romantic liaisons into the mix, but it doesn't jell.

On the positive side, the down-to-earth Israeli characters who parade through the movie are quite appealing, and the musical score is gently uplifting.

Yet As Tears Go By rarely rises above the mediocre level to which it is condemned. A pity.

Yiddish Players create a veritable laugh riot

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Two miserably ill patients who argue over who has helped most to make their doctor a rich man are upstaged by the doctor's mother who set him up in practice.

Sounds simple enough. But when you put this skit in the hands of the Yiddish Players — Gloria Valentine, Michael Lebovic and Allen Farkas — you have a laugh riot on your hands.

Lebovic, with his guttural expressions of outrage (always heightened in Yiddish), and Farkas, with his wimpish innocence, are great foils for Valentine's singing and dancing.

These premier exponents of Yiddish humor got a rousing reception recently at the Yiddishland Cafe at the Workmen's Circle, which is supported by the Jewish continuity committee of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Lebovic and Farkas were at their best in the skit where the father of the bride (Lebovic) tells his suspicious mechutin that they will both make money from the simchah — the guests will have to pay for their dinner. These two artists have rescued the art of Yiddish comedy from oblivion. They make you laugh until your sides ache.

They inexplicably did the famous "Einstein and Weinstein" skit by Dzigan and Schumacher in English, and it wasn't nearly as funny as when they do it in Yiddish.

Valentine's strength is in the singing and dancing numbers with the other two as in Abi gezunt and Hopkele.

TORONTO JEWISH FILM FESTIVAL PREVIEWS

Because Eliyah, the ancient Israeli prophet who, the Bible ascended to heaven in a fiery chariot, is regarded as a healer, a seat ("Elijah's Chair") is traditionally set aside for him at circumcision.

In Jewish folktales and mysticism, Elijah's timely appearance as a poor man or beggar can restore the health or save the life of a pious Jew. At Passover seders, we customarily pour a cup of wine for him, even open our door in the hope that he will enter. For Jews, Elijah is perceived as a forerunner of the Messiah and the coming redemption.

In Tkies Kaf (The Vow), the 1937 Yiddish film, Elijah is a traveller in disguise who witnesses two yeshivah students make a pledge to unite their unborn children in marriage. Twenty years later, when it looks like the sacred oath might be broken, Elijah intervenes to ensure that the two fated lovers are wed, and plays a sort of mystical Jewish cupid to enhance his usual role as protector of the poor.

A remake of a 1924 silent Yiddish classic, The Vow was filmed in Poland in 1937, and follows the earlier version quite closely. Elijah is played by Zygmund Turkow, part of a renowned family of Yiddish actors; Turkow appeared in the earlier version, even directed it when the hired director failed to show.

Regarded as "an underrated gem," The Vow has an added significance, for it prefigured a plot device used in The Dybbuk, the classic Yiddish film made immediately afterwards. Both stories give new meaning to the Yiddish term beshert.

The 90-minute film is being screened on May 4 at 5:30 p.m. along with two very short films, Sabbath In Amsterdam and Onions and Garlic.

The Return Of Sarah's Daughters, showing May 8 at 7 p.m., is a likable and intriguing 56-minute documentary comparing the lives of three women who are trying to find their places within Judaism. The trio consists of Marcia Jarmel, the American filmmaker, who had a secular Jewish upbringing and now seeks something deeper; Ruth, who took the plunge into Orthodox Judaism and never looked back; and Myriam, a lesbian who wants to find a place within the Jewish world but finds it unable to accommodate her as she is.

Ruth's tale of how she "came home" to Judaism seems to be the deeply satisfying centre of this film, while both Myriam and Marcia seem to fly like moths around the enticing flame of Torah, never quite finding a home. We don't see enough of Marcia in the film but we are compensated by her scheduled attendance at this world premiere.

The 47-minute documentary Nothing To Be Written Here (May 7, 7:30 p.m.) ostensibly focuses on the experiences of several thousand Jewish emigres in Britain during the war, who, though innocent of any espionage, were shipped to detention camps in New Brunswick, Ontario, Quebec and other places throughout the Commonwealth. Vancouver director Wendy Oberlander made the film last year after gradually discovering that her own father, an Austrian-born Jew, had been sent to Canada as an interned enemy alien.

For better or for worse, Oberlander flirts with the traditional objective orientation of the documentary format to present an artful subjective rendering of her pain around her father's long silence about his past. Still, the film manages to convey some essential details of this little-known chapter of Canada's wartime activities. Oberlander is scheduled to attend this Toronto premiere.

The new American-made film Grandpa's Funeral (May 8, 5:30 p.m.) is a 30-minute take on a Jewish funeral, turning a sombre event into biting, ironic comedy. It's being shown with another U.S.-made short, The Party Favor.

For a more traditional view of death, see Off The Wall, Harvey Ovshinksky's 23-minute homage to his friend, Michigan artist and sculptor Arthur Schneider. In this loving portrait, Schneider speaks openly about his Judaism, his art, and the cancer that eventually claims him. Off The Wall follows the 56-minute Israel-Czech film Black And White Is Full of Colours, scheduled for May 7, 5:30 p.m.

These are only a few of many screenings. All films are being shown May 1 to 8 at the Bloor Street Cinema, east of Bathurst. For tickets, call the Toronto Jewish Film Festival, 416-324-8226.

'Sex in Yiddish' to make debut

By DOROTHY LICHTBLAU
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Comedian Michael Wex will introduce his new show, Sex in Yiddish, at Ashketanz, a cabaret evening designed to offer a taste of the talent and diversity of Ashkenaz 1997.

Sex in Yiddish is made up of monologues with music. In addition to excerpts from this work, Ashketanz features comedienne Deb Filler, singer/actress Beth Anne Cole and The Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band. The show is on April 26, at 8 p.m. at the Bloor JCC. The Ashkenaz festival takes place this year at Harbourfront Centre, from Aug. 25 to Sept. 1.

Born in Lethbridge, Alta., to an Orthodox family, Wex, 42, writes scorching satire about Jewish life, which he often performs in Germany. With a PhD in Yiddish and yeshivah training, he writes about sex, drugs and rock'n roll — Jewish style.

Highly entertaining, his works are founded on a strong knowledge of Judaism and a sharp ear for language. Wex's writing is meant to be performed and he considers himself a raconteur in the tradition of Mark Twain or Charles Dickens, who exposed the foibles of their time and place in the common vernacular.

"One of the things I'm trying to do is capture a tone of voice, a particular way of speaking English that is being lost...a certain type of shrei mit kvetch," Wex says.

The statement is not entirely a joke, because if you listen carefully to Wex's tales, you realize that the shrei mit kvetching is not just about laughs, but about the Jew's eternal dialogue with God. Just as God will not leave us alone, so we do not let God be either. The discussion, à la Wex, is not quiet or polite either (after all Jews are involved), but passionate, bawdy and styled after the intellectual games that Talmud scholars play.

"People ask me, 'Why can't you write nice books like Chaim Potok?'" says Wex. "But look at a standard Potok book. The plot is, boy starts out religious but ends up not religious. The plot of mine is, boy starts out religious, kvetches for about 200 pages and stays religious."

Michael Wex

Thus Wex concedes that the tenets of Judaism are central to his writing. But you leave a show laughing.

Linked with the revival of Yiddish art and culture, Wex has been affiliated with Klezmer music for

Travel Talk

IN JERUSALEM, THREE SMALL MUSEUMS

Rabbi Abraham Mordechai Weingarten, whose family was descended from the first Ashkenazi aliyah in 1812, lived in a house on Or Ha-Chaim Street in the Old City of Jerusalem that had been the centre of social and spiritual life for the city's Jewish community for many generations.

Thus, it seemed appropriate that he be given a special honor that fateful spring day in 1948 when, amidst the incongruous swirl of bagpipes, the last column of British soldiers marched out of the city after an occupation of more than three decades.

As the soldiers departed, a few made a detour up the cobblestone alley to Rabbi Weingarten's house, where the rabbi was absorbed in sacred texts.

Responding to a knock, Rabbi Weingarten opened the door to find a British major standing there, offering him a foot-long iron rod — the antiquated key to the nearby Zion Gate, one of Jerusalem's seven main gates.

"From the year 70 AD until today," said the British major, "a key to the gates of Jerusalem has never been in Jewish hands. This is the first time in 18 centuries that your people have been so privileged."

When the elderly rabbi came to himself, he recited a prayer of thanks. Then he took the object, saying, "I accept this key in the name of my people."

Alas, Rabbi Weingarten and his family were soon forced to abandon their ancestral home when the Old City fell during the War of Independence. With the reunification of Jerusalem in the Six Day War of 1967, the house was returned to family members, who reconstructed and converted it into a museum to preserve the memory of the Old Yishuv or community.

Today the Old Yishuv Court Museum reflects the life of the Ashkenazi and Sephardi branches of the Jewish community from roughly 1850 to the end of the Ottoman era in 1917, showing living arrangements, household artifacts, a typical courtyard of the era and two historic synagogues.

Kabbalist

Built in the 15th century, the house had a rich history long before the Weingartens arrived. According to legend, the great kabbalist Rabbi Itzak ben Shlomo Luria Ashkenazi (known as Ari) was born in one of the ground-floor rooms in 1534.

A short walk from this house brings one to the charred remains of another destroyed and reconstructed Jewish home — the so-called Burnt House, torched by the Romans when they conquered Jerusalem in 70 CE. Carbon-14 dating shows that the house, once part of Herod's Upper City, was burned down precisely two weeks after the Second Temple was destroyed.

Today the new building is a museum showing a video and artifacts of the period.

When Israel recaptured the Old City of Jerusalem from Jordan in 1967, they found many centuries-old historic synagogues and other buildings of the Jewish provenance very badly damaged. The consolation was that, in some places, Israeli archeologists were able to dig down to an even earlier era of Jewish history, dating from Herodian times.

The Wohl Archaeological Museum shows off parts of the former wealthy Jewish neighborhood in Herod's Upper City, most excavated in the early 1970s. One descends, level by level, into this underground museum, examining frescoes, stucco reliefs and restored mosaics that indicate the strong Roman influence on Jewish life here 1,900 years ago.

As I toured the Wohl Museum, I encountered a group of Chicago-area Jews traveling on a UJA mission who cheerfully identified themselves as being from a "post-denominational synagogue," which seemed an appropriate response to the dilemma of Jewish factionalism. However, as many Israelis lament, not enough North American Jews visit their country when the political waters get a bit choppy.

Rafael Kadosh, the owner of Rafael's Gallery, an art and jewelry shop inside the Wohl Museum, likes to offer customers a complimentary coffee or Coke — along with a free opinion or two. 'Why is it that whenever there's a problem in Israel, the first to cancel are the Jews from America?" he recently asked this visiting journalist.

"The Germans keep coming, the French keep coming, the Christians keep coming. Only the Jews from America stop coming. Whenever there's a problem, they say, 'Okay, let's go next summer.' Instead, they should be saying, 'Let's go to Israel now and show our support.'"

Bill Gladstone recently travelled to Jordan and Israel at the invitation of the tourism ministries of both countries. He flew Toronto to Amman via Royal Jordanian and returned from Tel Aviv via Air Canada.

Entrepreneur at the controls of call processing company

By JAMES PASTERNAK
Special to The CJN

Peter Shurman gets ready for takeoff.

TORONTO — As Peter Shurman sits on the northwest runway at Buttonville Airport near Toronto, he is relying on about 35 metres, gauges, clocks, dials, measuring instruments and indicators that will tell him whether he's on track for a perfect takeoff. Once airborne, Shurman can see the heart of Toronto and the edge of the United States border.

Back in downtown Toronto, Shurman is at the controls of Universal TeleResponse (UTR) a Call Centre currently getting up to speed with the technology in telephone call answering and processing. As chief executive officer, Shurman is dependent on the technology that surrounds him. He must get it working and then promote the benefits to new and existing clients as the best choice for their customer service and sales applications. Each takeoff from Buttonville is a reminder of the challenge ahead.

The past six months have been some of the most dramatic in UTR's short history. A short but complicated move saw the company change locations. The facility has grown from 3,100 square feet to 6,000.

The other major development was the acquisition of the new equipment. With the new Infinity ESBX, Shurman is betting $200,000 that UTR can meet the increasing demands by North American companies for sophisticated and quality driven call processing.

UTR services what industry-watchers refer to as the middle of the road market of Call Centre providers. UTR is steps above the typical answering service yet at the same time, UTR is not positioned to handle the hundreds of thousands of calls generated by some direct response marketing campaigns. Currently UTR has 30 in-house agents that handle about 12,000 calls per day providing services such as order taking, pager dispatch and message taking.

"We don't aspire to be the biggest. We have to be the best. It's about technology," says Shurman.

The modern Call Centre is providing thousands of companies with the marketing, sales and customer support necessary to stay ahead in the competitive 1990s. Processing inbound telephone inquiries and making outboard plain sales and customer service calls, Call Centres are used for sales order taking, appointment setting, lead generation, technical support for consumer products, computers and software, financial transactions such as telebanking and booking of theatre and airline tickets.

The "call traffic" into Call Centres is usually generated by toll free numbers appearing on television, on instruction manuals, in catalogues, on radio, newspapers and other print media and mailers.

Seven years ago Shurman became a partner in a five-person messaging service called The Receptionist. Working with partner Brenda Preston, the company now has 55 full- and part-time staff and has grown 600 percent. Before that, for 21 years, Shurman was president of Standard Broadcasting. That is where he learned the balancing act between technology and human resources.

With advertisements in Direct Marketing News, the AT&T Yellow Pages and a new web site, Shurman is counting on new business from the United States to increase the operation to 55 stations within the next year and increase sales by 35 percent. He's looking to get as close as possible to filling his capacity of monthly inbound call handling. The web site is visited by approximately 24 companies or individuals per day.

As with any growing business, the typical owner-operator must face challenges everyday. "It's a tough, tough business. I have sleepless nights," says Shurman. But he adds,"No risk. No reward."

'Sex in Yiddish' to make debut

for many years. He performed in The Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band's album, Agada, and on the Klezmatics' newest release.

Like today's Klezmer music, Wex views his writing as a progression in style and content of the old Ashkenazi traditions, which can now flourish, because "it's no longer an embarrassment to sound like our bubbies and zaydes, nor is it politically unsafe."

Don't get him wrong, though, Wex says that buying bagels and dancing in circles has nothing to do with the continuation of Jewish culture. What he does is just entertainment. "You want to preserve Jewish culture, go to shul, send your kids to Hebrew school," he says.

Wex established his reputation as a performer by doing adaptations of his novel Shlepping the Exile and stand up routines about Yiddish. God In Paris, his play about a loose-living Yiddish poet, which blatantly describes the horrors of fascism and anti-Semitism. has been well-received in Canada and Germany.

Construction firm one of many seeking to gain from free trade

TORONTO — A Canadian road construction company has been shortlisted by Israeli contractors to begin work on building the Cross Israel Highway, running north to south through Israel.

Mississauga, Ont.-based Canadian Highways International Corporation (CHIC) has bid on the deal to construct the first 70 kilometres, as part of an International consortium. Four other consortiums are in the running for the contract.

CHIC is one of many Canadian businesses identified at a recent UJA Federation forum sponsored by Baker & McKenzie and Bank Hapoalim the Israel-Canada Free Trade Agreement.

International Trade Minister Art Eggleton, Israeli Trade Commissioner and Economic Consul Yael Varasano-Barzilay and Lawrence Davis, vice-president Corporate Finance Group at Price Waterhouse highlighted sectors of opportunity in Israel for Canadian companies at the forum.

Other companies seeking to gain from the trade agreement include Bombardier Inc. and software company Icon.

275 PERSONAL COMPANIONS WANTED

 CJN Boxes for Personal Companions Wanted ads are valid for 30 (thirty) days only (from 1st publication date). Replies must be received within this time frame in order to be forwarded to the appropriate CJN Box #.

Attr. lady, hardworking, immigrant from S. Africa, seeks a gentleman friend, 60-65, for a genuine & meaningful relationship. CJN Box 6912.

Attr. tall male,fin. secure, seeks special relationship with woman late 20's - late 30's. 633-1728.

275 PERSONAL COMPANIONS WANTED

I have a fine, considerate, reliable, indep. brother, 41, who has a slight learning disability & dreams of meeting a caring, sensitive woman for a long term relationship. 221-4714.

Wanted: Single Jewish Women, Melbourne, Australia.
We are an informal group of Melbourne-based single Jewish males, aged mid-30's to early-40's who have not yet met those special SJF's to share each of our lives. Despite each of us mixing actively in different circles, we have found the Melbourne & Sydney social scene to be 'stale' with a shortage of eligible SJF's.
The majority of remaining 30+ y/o SJF's are either divorced with children or carrying heavy emotional or other unacceptable baggage. Within the organized Jewish community, despite the noise from our 'leaders', there is no truly effective means of meeting potential partners. Essentially, any effort to do so must be our own. So we have chosen to advertise overseas.
We are each professionally qualified or self-employed. We are each healthy and 'normal' with no physical or intellectual disabilities. We are each well-travelled, genuine, positive & sensitive guys. Most of us are well-established. We are not necessarily tall, dark or especially handsome & none of us ride white horses,but each of us is 'a good catch'. None of us have been married. We are all committed to living in Melbourne, a clean, safe, green & very comfortable city of over 3 million people with an active Jewish community of some 45,000.
This is not a match-making service, but a logical means of making contact with eligible, intelligent, SJF's who would contemplate re-location to Australia. So if you are: 1) in your 30's to early 40's; 2) attractive; 3) intelligent; 4) without serious disability or baggage, and 5) prepared to re-locate, then please send comprehensive details, preferably including photo(s), phone & fax numbers in the first instance to:
Albert Sattler, P.O. Box 227, South Yarra,Victoria,3141, Australia, ph# 61-2-93278493 or fax: 61-2-93623320.
or e-mail: Maddison@connexus.apana.org.au.
Be assured of complete confidentiality. All correspondence will be promptly acknowledged.

Young man, 68, would like to meet a sincere, warm-hearted female friend who would enjoy dining out & spending time together. CJN Box 6913.

Attr., warm, easy-going lady, good sense of humour, with many interests; swimming, theatre, walking, travelling & more. Would like to meet a gentleman, 60-70, who has similar zest for life! Please incl. photo. CJN Box 6915.

Educated, ambitious SJM, 30, with no car, computer or money & currently upgrading skills, seeks SJF in 20's who maintains a healthy lifestyle & does not seek short-term extravagance. Please call 783-3069.

Rookie Nemirovksy makes Florida Panthers' lineup

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It's amazing the difference a year can make.

Last season at this time, right winger David Nemirovsky was back in junior with the Sarnia Sting, tearing up the league after playing nine games during a half-season stint with the Florida Panthers.

This year, he's a regular contributor for the Cats, usually playing on a line with Tom Fitzgerald and Bill Lindsay.

At age 20, Nemirovsky is taking the next step along the path laid out for him by Panthers management, who selected him in the fifth round, 84th overall, in the1994 entry draft.

The personable and thoughtful winger believes he can develop into the kind of player the team's brain trust expects of him — a fast-skating, playmaking goal-scorer.

A rookie with the Panthers, Nemirovsky has progressed physically and mentally from last season, when he got his first exposure of NHL hockey.

"I'm a year older, a lot more mature and stronger," the six-foot-one, 192-pound winger said after a game-day practice at Maple Leaf Gardens. "The NHL is a big learning experience. You never stop learning all through your career."

Nemirovsky, who hails from Toronto, believes his positional play and his attention to defence have helped him stick in the league. Junior hockey, he says, is much more scrambly than the NHL, where more attention is paid to positioning and taking care of business in your own zone.

The Panthers, long known for their strong defence, expect you to "go out and work hard, take care of our own end, make sure the puck is out of our end and deep in their zone," he said.

In addition to signing on to the Cats' prescription for sound positional play, Nemirovsky has put on some muscle, allowing him to compete with rugged NHL defencemen. He's also a little faster and stronger on his skates than last year, making him better able to fend off checks while holding on to the puck.

So far this season, one of Nemirovsky's biggest thrills has been to line up against the best players in hockey. Playing against Mario Lemieux was especially memorable: "I'll be able to say I played against Lemieux. It was a big thrill to play against him.

"Playing at this level is very exciting. Every game I've played in is a big thrill," he said.

David Nemirovsky

So far this season, Nemirovsky's numbers are typical for a player his age just getting to know the league. In 38 games, he's scored seven goals and seven assists for 14 points, spent 32 minutes in the penalty box and is plus one. Last year, after being returned to the junior around Jan. 1, he scored 18 goals and 27 assists in 26 regular season games. In 10 OHL playoff games, he bulged the twine eight times and added eight assists before the Sting was eliminated.

Nemirovsky admits that with the season winding now, his mind is wandering to the playoffs ahead. He brushes aside concerns over the Panthers' late-season slump, saying the team went through something similar last season and surprised everybody to get to the final.

The playoffs are his top priority and he feels it's too early to start worrying about the Maccabiah Games in Israel. Both he and his brother, Mikhail, have been touted by Maccabi Canada organizers as key members of the team. Nemirovsky said he'll make his final decision whether to join the team after the season is over.

Mikhail, meanwhile, has had an up and down season in the minor pro leagues. He started with Fort Wayne of the IHL but was cut when a new coach came on board. After a stint with Fredericton in the AHL, he ended up with Flint Generals of the Colonial Hockey League, where he spent last season. Unfortunately, his season has been plagued with injuries and he now suffers from shin splints that are so serious he may require surgery, making him questionable for the Maccabiah Games, David said.

Ultimate Matzah Balls don't sink or float

By LESLEY PEARL
Jewish Bulletin of Northern Carolina

SAN FRANCISCO — You might expect to find Ultimate Matzah Balls on the cooking page, especially at this time of year. But not these. Neither sinkers nor floaters, they're not even edible. They're a team of Jewish men from across the country who take to the field once a year to play ultimate, a game that uses a frisbee and most closely resembling rugby in its rules and play.

Prior to the match they say a Shehechiyanu (a prayer of thanksgiving said for new beginnings) and toast l'chayim with a bottle of kosher wine. On the sideline is a cooler full of Hebrew: the Chosen Beer, Noah's bagels, shmears and gefilte fish. Klezmer blares from the boom box.

For some team members, "this is the one 'Jewish' thing they do," said David Barkan, Matzah Balls founder and an organizational consultant from Forest Knolls in Marin County. "It's almost spiritual — the Jewish shtick, the bonding of brothers."

Matzah Balls travelled from as far as New York, Seattle and Boston to converge on the campus of the U.C. Santa Cruz for the annual April Fool's ultimate tournament.

They placed fifth, which Barkan considers a good omen of sorts. "We figure a Jewish team wasn't supposed to win on Easter weekend," he joked.

In fact, the Matzah Balls — mostly professionals, including doctors and graphic artists — took first place in 1996 and 1995, the year the team was formed.

"Many of the best [ultimate] players I know are Jewish," Barkan said. "We're short and fast."

Three years ago, Barkan, a two-time player on the American all-star ultimate team, put out a call to Jewish players around the country. He asked them to join an all-Jewish team for the annual April Fool's Day tournament, then held at Stanford University.

More than 10 years old, the April Fool's Day tournament attracts ultimate teams, most of them from the west coast, for two days of competition.

Many of the teams, like Barkan's, are themed. Included in this year's roster of 20 male and 15 female teams was the Affirmative Action Ultimate Team, made up entirely of players of color.

Although the tournament is known for its playful spirit — the Matzah Balls do double duty as both players and cheerleaders — the game is nonetheless played with a vengeance. And by the rules.

Created in 1968 by a group of college students in New Jersey, ultimate involves seven players from each team passing a disk to score. Unlike football, ultimate requires that each player work every position.

"We were just a bunch of rag-tag Jewish boys horsing around when we formed. These were my rivals who I'd competed against in national competitions," Barkan said. "Every single one I called showed up with just over two weeks' notice. It really clicked."

Shattering Glass

Novel has a ring of authenticity

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Nancy-Gay Rotstein

TORONTO — Nancy-Gay Rotstein's background as a lawyer, children's rights advocate, director of arts and government agencies and working mother provide her first novel, Shattering Glass, with the ring of authenticity.

But it's as a writer that Rotstein, a Toronto-born author of three published books of poetry, identifies herself first and foremost.

With the recent release of her new book by McClelland & Stewart in Canada (it came out last year in the United States), chances are good her name will become known to a much larger audience here.

On one level, Shattering Glass is absorbing and meaty fiction, with three parallel stories that converge at the end of the 373-page book.

On a deeper level, it's a sometimes disturbing social commentary on issues facing many contemporary women. Balancing career and family is "the most pressing and unresolved issue facing families today," said Rotstein, 52, in a recent interview.

"For me the novel seemed the best vehicle for exploring real life situations in a way that would have the greatest emotional impact," she said. The book grew from "a need" to write about those issues after she entered law school at age 39 as a mother of three.

The characters, all of whom have a close mother-child bond and are required to draw on previously untapped inner strength, are "a little bit a part of me," said Rotstein.

One enters law school as a 30-something mother to overcome the grinding poverty that followed her divorce; the second – a Canadian, incidentally – is virtually a single mother, with a politician husband who spends most of his time in Ottawa while she holds the tony Rosedale fort; the third, a traditional housewife and mother, writes a successful novel as her insecure lawyer husband becomes increasingly abusive.

Unlike her fictional counterparts, Rotstein, who lives within commuting distance of Toronto, boasts a happy long-term marriage. "Keineinhora, it will be 30 years."

So why don't any of her characters end up in a happily-ever-after relationship?

"It's not that there's not a happy ending," said Rotstein. (There isn't, but the book's still a good read.) "It deals with realistic situations... This is about all the things we weren't warned would happen."

As women shatter glass ceilings, complications arise in their personal lives, she said. "Today we're measuring our success by our achievements outside the home, but like our mothers and grandmothers, we're continuing to believe we're failures when we have problems in our personal lives. This creates guilt. It robs us of self-confidence and limits our potential for happiness."

Women must learn to be kinder to themselves, she believes.

Rotstein's personal definition of success is "being content within yourself."

Of all her accomplishments, the 1989 U.K. publication of China: Shockwaves, a slim hardcover volume of poetry, represented a shattering of one of her personal glass ceilings, "a point beyond which you thought you might never go."

The book (U.K. edition only), unlike her novel, touched on Jewish themes in one or two poems. Nonetheless, Rotstein, whose background is traditional but not Orthodox, says she writes "as a Jewish writer. My sensibility is Jewish. My Jewish identity and writing are very closely interwoven."

Rotstein says she only writes a book when she feels one needs to be written. A disciplined writer, she works — in longhand — from the time she wakes up until late afternoon. It's "a very isolating life," but at the same time "very exhilarating.

"I have a passion for language and the craft of writing," she said. The novel she thought she would complete in six months took her seven years, thanks to intensive on-location research and major rewrites.

"Every word has to be the right word," she said.

WE SELL SUB-ZERO FOR LESS

BEEF BRISKET WITH ORANGE LEMON MARMALADE

1 beef brisket (6-8 lbs.)
2 large onions, sliced
2 large lemons, peeled and thinly sliced
2 cups grape juice
1/2 cup brown sugar
4 cloves garlic, chopped
1-1/2 tsp. pepper

Place onion slices, lemon slices, and garlic in roasting pan. Lay brisket on top.

Mix together juice and brown sugar; stir until sugar dissolves; pour over brisket. Sprinkle brisket with pepper, and cover roasting pan tightly with foil. Bake at 300°F until tender (about 4 hours).

Uncover pan and return to oven. Raise temperature to 450°F and brown meat 20 minutes. Remove brisket from pan.

Skim fat from pan juices and put juices and vegetables into sauce pan. Broil, uncovered, stirring often. As mixture thickens, reduce heat to medium and stir constantly; cook until thick and shiny, and reduced to about 1-3/4 cups. Add salt to taste. To serve: slice, spoon marmalade over brisket. Garnish with lemon "bows" and chopped parsley.

About Seniors

Dear Jesse,

I fell and fractured my hip. After surgery and four weeks of rehabilitation, I was sent home. At the time of discharge, I was told that it would be important for me to continue my physiotherapy and that it would be safer for me to have someone help with my bath.

I wanted to go home knowing that there were others who needed my bed. I hired a home care worker. Since I could not get an appointment for three months at the hospital for physio, I made arrangements to go to a private clinic.

Why should I have to pay GST in addition to the fees? I am saving the government money and they are taxing me. That seems very unfair to me.

MG

Dear MG,

I agree. There have been some efforts to push the governments to eliminate the tax on private health services. In fact, there should be benefits to those who buy private health care. Up to this point there has been little success.

Write a letter to your member of Parliament expressing your views. Perhaps, other will do the same. In fact, I am going to write a letter to my member of Parliament.

Readers are invited to send any questions they have for Jesse to The CJN. Jesse is the executive director of Jewish Support Services for the Elderly (JSSE) in Montreal
